CHAPTER 15 BETTY'S MESSAGE FOR LIL LIAN-WHAT IT

MADGE. Lillian swallowed her hot tea bediently, and I followed her example. There was nothing else to do. The big. sombre, orangetinged eyes of the old colored woman were inexorably upon us. Lillian evidently knew that Betty would keep her word and her counsel until we had satis'ied her bell hop. that we had been duly refreshed my brain was busy with conjectures concerning the possible meaning of this summons from the sister of Robert Savarin. "Don't know," the old woman answered laconically. "Ah don't ask no questions what ain't mah business. But," evidently yielding to the desire to make a confidant of somebody, "dat sister of Mister Sabarin's couldn't keep de cryin' out of her voice nohow when she was talkin' to me.

When I rushed back with the water she slipped a small tablet from a tiny vial which she took from a hidden pocket in her gown, swallowed it, and drank a little of the water. Then she laid her head against the back of the chair, and I. wondering, frightened, clasped her wrist and waited until a faint color began to creep into her cheeks. Then I found my voice in passionate protest. "Look here!" I said almost roughly. "Why have you never told me about this? I know what those things are. My little mother had to take them for years, but her heart was dangerously affected. Are you-have you-oh. Lillian!

I choked, stopped, unable to go on. Lillian put out her hand. pulled me down beside her: "Foolish puss" she said gently. "I haven't heart trouble. I'm simply worn out nervously and physically, if I can ever get away from everything for a few months I'll be all right again. In the mean time these little things are an ever present help in time of trouble, although if I ever catch you using them to brace up on I'll break your neck." Her lips twisted into a whimsical grimace, then she began without further ado to explain her telephone conversation.

The papers of the day are filled with pictures of Florence Kling Harding. What a change from a few years ago, when the new first lady of the land was taking in music scholars on a back street in Marion, O., to make a living for her son and herself. Aladdin would be compelled to rub the lamp several times before he could equal that record.
