ALL CANNERS ARE PUZZLED

Situation is Uncertain, Says Paulus of Oregon Growers' Association

NO ORDERS RECEIVED

Wholesalers Financially Unable to Place Their Advance Estimates

At present the canning situation is very uncertain due to a number of causes, according to R. C. Paulus, general manager of the Oregon Growers' Cooperative association.

One of these causes, Mr. Paulus says, is the lack of orders for future delivery in large quantities, canneries usually receive at this time of the year, and another is the difficulties canneries have in financing themselves.

Canners Uncertain.— With no orders, managers of canneries are in an uncertain frame of mind, not only as to the amount they should pack, but what is of importance to the grower, as to the price they can afford to pay for fruit.

Wholesalers are financially unable to place their usual advance orders for canned goods. Mr. Paulus says, on account of their heavy losses on sugar, coffee and other commodities. As everyone knows there was a very rapid decline in the price of sugar not so many months ago and many wholesale houses that handled canned goods, suffered serious financial loss.

Small packs may result.— This policy, if continued, Mr. Paulus believes, will result in lack of orders for canneries. They will be obliged to put up a small pack without having future orders already on hand.

One of the results of this policy Mr. Paulus says will be that the trade will be out of canned goods before the end of the season and in the meantime a considerable portion of the fruit will have spoiled.

Packers Refinancing.— On account of heavy losses taken last season due to shrinkage in values at inventory taking, almost all canneries are now busy refinancing themselves. However, much thought is now being given by bankers and growers as to the best methods of handling the canning proposition this year. Some plan will probably be worked out, Mr. Paulus says, but just what it will be is at present difficult to determine.</
