STOCKBRIDGE'S OFFICE. For a long moment Alice Holombe and I faced each other tensely, she insistent on the course she had outlined, I equally determined against it.

I was willing to go to many lengths for Alice Holcombe, but this propos t.on to spy upon my principal's wife through a transom was something I could not do. I was big enough, however, to see the justice of her gtandpoint. It was her duty, her privilege to protect the man she loved from the crazed maneuvers of his wife. But while I was perfectly willing to help her even to a point involving personal danger, I felt that I must refuse this thing she had asked, nay commanded me to

I debated for a moment whethor or not I should knock on that closed door. Then my common atives. sense asserted itself, and told me that Mrs. Stockbridge was the real intruder, and that either Miss H.
