All members of the club are looking forward to this, the first of a number of summer picnifications planned during vacation time.

River Falls Below Level—Two-tenths feet below level was registered by the Willamette river here yesterday. The river first fell to its normal level three days ago and has since maintained a steady march downward and will likely continue to do so throughout the summer.

OREGON WORKS IN LIBRARY

New Volume Has Elaborate Bibliography of History of Northwest

ALASKAN BOOK RECEIVED

Collection Covers Pacific Coast From Pioneer Days to Present

"Of making of books there is no end." That's true, even when it comes to making books about so comparatively a new and raw country as the Pacific Northwest; for "The Pacific Northwest Americana," a new volume of bibliography just received by the Oregon state library, lists 4501 books and historical manuscripts that have been written or published covering this section.

This excludes strictly state papers and documents, and verse and stories and personal productions that are not history. It is the list of original sources from which the accurate historian will gather his material when he wants to really know the northwest.

Compiled by Seattle Man—The compiler, Charles W. Smith, assistant librarian of Washington state university, sent out questionnaires to all the known public or important private libraries of the northwest, asking for a list of all the historical works on the Pacific Northwest. While it is quite certain that not all the documents are so listed, those that reported any especially rare volumes or collections are noted in the description of the works themselves; so that the student looking for the unusual authorities will know where to look for them.

The Oregon State Library has an especially fine collection of the older documents and volumes; though owing to the terms of the questionnaire, not all of them were listed in the bibliography. Many of the very rarest volumes known, bearing on the history of the Oregon country, are now in the Oregon library; they may be listed in a subsequent publication.

Histories Plentiful—Four thousand five hundred volumes of histories tell a lot of things of men and events that not many people now living know even by hearsay; of thrilling or ignoble deeds, of wealth and poverty, of heroism and cowardice that alike contribute much to history, and making, there's no doubt, for the reader's interest.

Another new volume of great value to the historical writer is the "Subject Index to the History of the Pacific Northwest and Alaska." It covers as far as possible every writer, every prominent name in the drama of the "Oregon territory" as it was all known a hundred years ago, and every event of note, with the references to the books where the story can be found.

California Studied—A third volume that does not reach back so far, but nevertheless has a "kick" that has been even more world-wide, is the bibliographical record of all the narratives and stories of California prior to 1845. While California itself was known long before Oregon, and there are Spanish and other writings far antedating anything relating to the northwest, the years between 1824, when Jason Lee came to make the real Oregon, and 1847 when the real California story begins, produced loads and loads of Oregon books when California was a literary desert. But with the discovery of gold in California, the literary output in narrative form became a real avalanche, and the bibliographer has had to list an almost uncounted number of narratives long and short in those 18 years. From this list, one could trace down almost everything ever printed about California; for it is much more inclusive than the book lists of the Pacific northwest, and might apply to every letter written to the crossroads newspaper "back in the States."

The Oregon library contains much of this class of material, though naturally not as much as the southern libraries.

WARM WEATHER RIPENS LOGANS

Berries Are Believed Coming In Now at Maximum Rate of Speed

State of Montana Has Adopted Oregon Law

Continued warm weather is causing loganberries to ripen fast and it is thought that they have reached about the maximum rate at which they will come in.

The Salem plant of the Oregon Growers Cooperative association is producing more than 100,000 logans every day and the district in the Liberty district are getting for a heavy tonnage of the berries. Those coming to Salem are distributed to canneries in Corvallis, Falls City and Salem.

The berries this year are of the best quality and the demand for them is increasing as the end of the season is coming into sight.

In the opinion of M. P. Adams who is in charge of the warehouse of the association at Brooks the berries will continue to come for 10 days longer. Nearly 170 tons of berries or 23 cars have been shipped from Brooks where they have been leaving at the rate of two cars a day. Monday there were three cars sent from that point to be processed at the Kings Products company's plant at Tule, Dallas.

Educator Laid to Rest in City View Cemetery

Many persons of prominence including the highest state officials and educators from the state's leading institutions of higher learning, attended the funeral yesterday of J. H. Ackerman, later president of Oregon Normal school of Monmouth. Interment took place in City View cemetery here after funeral services in the chapel of the normal school at Monmouth. At the latter place a funeral sermon was given by Rev. W. G. Elliot, pastor of the First Unitarian church of Portland. The services at the grave were conducted by Washington Masonic lodge of Portland, of which Mr. Ackerman was at one time master. Salem Masonic bodies assisted. The body lay in state for several hours during the morning at the Webb & Clough chapel prior to being taken to Monmouth.

Two Sentenced by Judge Kelly, One is Paroled

William Whitney and Everett Owen were given penitentiary sentences when they appeared before Circuit Judge Percy R. Kelly, yesterday morning.

Owen was paroled by the court to State Parole Officer Percy Varney after being sentenced to serve a "without limitation" period of not more than two years. He had pleaded guilty to the offense of taking to Albany the car owned by Peter Ebrz of Dallas.

Whitney, whose offense was the burglary of several articles from the Lockhart second-hand store, told Judge Kelly that he had just completed a jail sentence in Portland and had resorted to theft only after failing to obtain work because of his reputation. He was sentenced to serve not more than five years in the state penitentiary.
