WHAT DICKY SAID TO MADGE WHEN HE FOUND HER. The long-drawn whistle of the newspaper train brought me to my feet, quivering. I crossed hurriedly, opened my door with infinite care, then one of the family should be disturbed, and stole downstairs to the hall, where I huddled into a high-backed chair—one of Dicky's treasures—to wait for the appearance of the paper man.

At last I heard the clump of his feet in the driveway, counted the steps with feverish impatience until they halted a little way from the veranda. Then the thud of the folded newspaper as it left the skillful hand of the delivery man struck the door, told me that my vigil was ended.

Relief of Tears. I waited until I was sure the man was out of sight before unbarring the door and taking the paper in. Then, after fastening the door, I took the paper to the library—the most secluded room downstairs—switched on the light, for the dawn outside was not yet strong enough for reading, and struck down to search for the thing I dreaded to find.

First page, second, third, fourth, I went over them carefully, finally upon the fifth, my eyes caught sight of an inconspicuous headline: FORMER FOOTBALL HERO FINDS WIFE POISONED. I read the brief news story feverishly, then turned back and read it again, drawing a long breath of relief when I had finished.

For there was nothing in the news story save the bald facts which Alice Holcombe had narrated to me. The cause of her death was spoken of as a "mysterious poisoning," the source of which was in doubt, and it was further stated that an autopsy was to be performed to determine the nature of the poison, which was evidently a quick and powerful one.

There was no hint of connecting Kenneth Stockbridge with the death of his wife, and no word which could possibly lead any one to conjecture that his marital life had been anything but happy. I knew enough of newspapers to realize that if poor Milly Stockbridge's name threatened to figure in a divorce, naming Alice Holcombe and myself, had been published the news of it would have connected with the story of her death. Nevertheless I carefully scanned every column of the paper to assure myself beyond all doubt that the horrible thing was not hidden in some obscure corner. When at last I had fearfully finished the last column of the last page my overstrained nerves gave way. The paper slipped from my hands to the floor and I buried my face in the arm of my chair in a paroxysm of hysterical weeping.

"Look at Me!" I felt my hands drawn upward, and Dicky's face, mystified, anxious, looked down at me. "For the love of sanity, Madge!" he exploded, "whatever is the matter with you?" The room whirled with me. How was I ever to explain my emotion to my husband? I had been so careful to keep from him any suspicion of the unpleasant conditions surrounding my teaching at Bayview, that I knew the revelation of it would not only shock him, but anger him because of the deceit he would justly consider that I had given him. "I—I—don't know," I stammered. "I guess I'm getting worn out, nervously. I awakened a long while ago, and after trying in vain to get back to sleep, I—I—thought—I would come down here and read awhile."

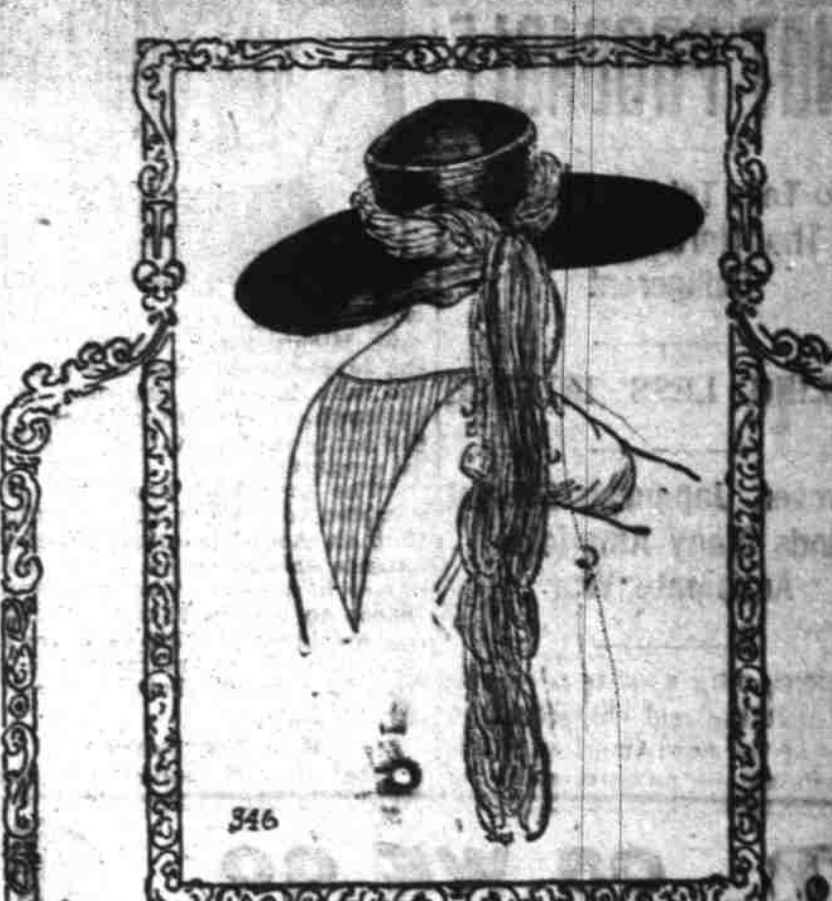

There was a long silence. I did not look at Dicky, but I felt his gaze upon me. "Look at me," he burst out thickly at last. "I need my eyes miserably to his, met in them the old, angry jealous look which I had not seen in Dicky's eyes for many months. "That spief won't go," he said coarsely. "I happened to be wafeful, too, this morning, and

I heard you when you stole down stairs. I thought at first you'd gotten hungry or something, and thought nothing about it. Then I heard you take in the morning paper and go into the library. I waited for a while, and decided I'd come down and take a slant at this news myself. And then I hear this wild weeping and find you like this. "Something's doing that I don't know anything about, but don't make any mistake, I'm going to know right now."

(To be continued) Canon Case Appealed to State Supreme Court. Boon Cason, father of Wayne Cason, Portland youth who was killed in the Portland police station about a year ago, has appealed to the supreme court a case in which he asks $39,000 damages. He failed to collect damages in the lower court in Multnomah county.

The title of the case is the City of Portland ex rel. Boon Cason, as administrator of the estate of Wayne Cason, plaintiff and appellant, vs George L. Baker, mayor of Portland; Leon V. Jenkins, chief of police of the city of Portland, and others, including the surety company in which the officials are bonded.

Young Cason was killed by the discharge of a revolver, following his arrest on a minor charge. It was claimed the shooting was accidental, caused by the falling of a revolver to the floor.
