You will receive no answer if you do, nor shall I speak to you again until you have come to your seses.

Why Madge Refrained.

I felt an insane desire to laugh at the vision which suddenly rose before me of Dicky and I going through our daily routine of life rithout speaking to each other, of the wrath of my mother-in-law, the amazement of the rest of the family. But my husband's white face, his coldly wrathful eyes effectually precluded any idea of mirth, even though his threat was childish melodrama. "That rests with you." I told him stiffly. "I shall follow your cue whatever it may be." I waited for no further answer but walked out of the door. I had gone but a step or two before I heard the rustle of paper, knew that Dicky was searching through the newspaper I had dropped for some clue to the agitation I had displayed after reading it. With my spirits at zero I went upstairs to my room, locked the door behind me, and sat down to consid-

Dicky's anger had thrust upon I knew very well that his pride would prevent him from carrying out the threat he had made. He would never endure Katie's wideeyed amazement Jim's furtive looks, my father's silent disapproval, and his mother's voluble and caustic critic'sm of the course he had outlined for us. But, on the other hand, I knew that his stubbornness would keep him from receding in any way from the ultimatum he had given me. There would be but one thing that he could do. I was sure that he was even now planning the details of a sudden, ap-
