We may say in reply and without any vainglory that we are growing as yet more bulbs than any other grower on the Pacific coast or west of the Mississippi river. As to the east, we can not speak with definiteness. There have been two or three experimental farms recently started there, notably one in Michigan. With that drop of Western imagery in our blood, we are perhaps pleased to presume that our undertaking is the largest, but we are the more concerned that the

Caution Needed. Of course certain principles must be observed in planning a diversified fruit farm. Too much diversity, especially on a small planting, will result in the production of a lot of varieties none of which may be produced in commercial quantities. Each variety should be produced in commercial quantity. The crops should be non-competitive for labor. Cherries, loganberries and raspberries would be a poor combination of crops, since the harvest season of these three overlap to such an extent that there would be a severe competition for pickers. Crops should be grown that will have their harvest seasons follow in Albany Elm Recovers From Attack of Bugs ALBANY, Or., Aug. 16.-Local horticulturists are pondering tver what they say is a rare phonomenon that occurred when a cork elm tree here, bereft of its leaves the middle of July, reclothed itself during August. This tree, a young one, was the victim of attacks by the larvae of the elm leaf beetle. Not a leaf was left with a trace of green and only the fibrous skeletons remained. As soon as the larvae had eaten up all there was to be found they dropped to the ground, curled up and became pupae. Now they have become adult beetles. Meanwhile the tree, rid of its parasites, dropped the dead leaves and has grown a complete set of new ones. At present its new dress gives the elm a strikingly spring-like air. INSISTS ON CONTROL. RIGA, Aug. 16 .- Walter L. Brown, European director of the American relief administration.
