SENATE DEFERS ANTI-BEER BILL

Agricultural Relief Bill Given Precedence By Senatorial Body

SEARCH RIGHT SUSTAINED

Prohibition Measure Will Be Acted Upon After Mid-Summer Recess

WASHINGTON, Aug. 23.—Congress was ready tonight to quit work tomorrow for 30 days regardless of what might happen to the anti-beer bill.

Soon after adoption of the conference report on the measure by the house, it was sent to the senate, called up and given the right of way, but by general agreement, subject to displacement by a conference report on the agricultural relief bill. The senate, remained in session tonight in order to have the latter measure before it, as leaders had agreed that it was the most pressing legislation to be acted upon before the recess.

Bill Is Threatened There were indications tonight that if prohibition leaders were bent upon keeping the anti-beer bill to the fore, its opponents would attempt to talk it to death. Republican leaders declared, however, if the farmer bill could be made ready for the president's approval, the recess would begin at the time set, leaving the beer question open for action in the fall.

Senator Sterling, Republican, South Dakota, chief of the senate managers, in explaining the compromise on the Stanley amendment relating to search of homes, which the senate had adopted by unanimous vote some weeks ago, declared there had been hope of having the house approve it as originally drafted.

Question Revived There were constant interruptions from senators who insisted that the law making a man's home his castle was as old as the world. Senator Sterling insisted, however, that under the compromise, a home could not be searched except on a warrant obtained from a court, but that no warrant was required to search other property provided an officer had reasonable cause to suspect violation of law and was not accompanied by violence.
