Corvallis Man Sarcastic Regarding Charges, Passenger Fare Cheaper CORVALLIS, Or., Aug. 25.—Here is the most recent yarn concerning present day freight rates: Freight for seven pigs, Kingstons, Or., to Corvallis, Or., $13.99 Seven first class passenger fares between the above named cities cost $8.75.

The foregoing is the gist of a story published in the Banks Oregon Herald, and concerns an experience related by A. L. Stevenson of this city in shipping livestock recently purchased by him.

Recently Colonel Stevenson purchased two large porkers and five small pigs at Kingston, a small town east of Corvallis on the Corvallis and eastern. The larger animals were each placed in separate crates while the piglets were placed in a big box, the three crates being shipped to Corvallis by freight.

At his home city, the auctioneer eventually received his property and also a freight statement for the sum of $13.99, the freight agent explaining that a "three times first class" freight rate had been charged as an alternative to paying for 3000 pounds of freight. No satisfactory explanation was given as to why this "three times" rate was charged, according to Mr. Stevenson.

Again the auctioneer became curious and upon inquiry ascertained that seven first class passenger fares between Kingston and Corvallis could be purchased for the total sum of $8.75 or $1.25 full fare for one person.

"I might have set those pigs up on the cushions and saved money even if no half fare was allowed for the little fellows," ruefully observes the Corvallis colonel. "Such business methods as this, helps make business for the auto truck lines," he concludes.

Moore's home is in Corvallis, while Cornet's parents live in Tillamook. They are described as being of dark complexion, with brown eyes and hair. Both were dressed in khaki and wore heavy shoes.

A reward of $5 for information leading to their return has been offered by the authorities.
