A Memory Test

Something in her manner made me think she recognized some of the peculiarities of which I had spokent. Was it possible that she knew the man's identity? In my excitement I almost put the query to her, but I checked myself in time. If she thought it best for me to share her knowledge I knew that she would tell me everything without questioning. I made her see how vital it was that the man's identity be established. That was all with which I needed to concern myself. The rest could safely be left in her hands. A little later I found that she w shed more than a description of the man's person. After stting rigidly silent for a moment or two while she evidently conned and filed for future reference the information I had given her, she spoke again; abruptly: "Now I want another test of your memory, Madge. Can you give me your conversation with that man verbat m, even to the inflections of your voices? I want to see whether he got anything out of you."

I do not believe that I finve ever experienced a more delicious moment of gratified pride than that which came to me when at the close of my parration-which was an exact reproduction of my conversation with the mysterious stranger-Lillian said approving-'y and with lingaring emphasis:
"G o-o-d g-i-r-i! You didn't. give him even the tiniest crumb of nformat'on, and that's vital in this mess. Be stre that you stick to exactly the same attitude when the man comes tack."

Lillian's Plans.

"Oh. do you think he will come back?" I asked dismayed "Why, of course!" Lillian returned. The next minute she looked up at me, her eyes gleam-'ng as they always do with the sudden flashing of a new scheme nto her bra'n. "How would you like to have
