this letter is rather disquieting."
"Anything that I can help?" Mr. Walters's face was alive with earnest eagerness. "I'm afraid not," I said regretfully. "Except that I wish you would answer without reserve one. question."

"If I can," his legal caution asserting itself. What are the chances of Mr. Stockbridge's acquittat?" The face of Kenneth Stock-Prices quoted are wholesale and prices received by farmers. No retail price bridge's friend shadowed.
"I wish I could answer that question unreservedly in the affirmative," he said soberly, as things stand now his friends are in that sad state known as never giving up hope while life lasts."

He hesitated, looked at strangely, as he continued: A Hidden Query?

"Perhaps you know that the chief obstacle to Kenneth's vindication lies in his obstinate refusal to say anything which will clear him in any way. He has been absolutely silent upon this subject since his arrest. I happen know that his attorneys, the leader of whom is one of the ablest in the country, are very apprehensive of the outlook. If only there was any one who knew or sad affair which might help him. and who would come forward unreservedly and tell what he knew. it might solve the whole problem. But people are so afraid of being implicated in an affair of this kind-" I was looking him steadily in the eyes by this time, for whole manner pointed the direct accusation he dared, -- make, that I knew something which would help Kenneth Stockbridge if I only possessed the moral courage to tell it. The indiguation he must have seen in my face evidently nonplussed him for his voice trailed off into silence and his face flushed with embarrassment.

I divested my face and voice of all anger, however, before I answered him. After all, this atbridge's was justified in his as More Being Sown Than Any sumption. Both the principal's insistence that I must not be implicated and my own emotion upon reading his letter pointed strongly to my knowledge of facts yet unrevealed.
