REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

CHAPTER 213 HOW LILLIAN UNDERWOOD "SAVED" AN AWKWARD

SITUATION. In compunction for my rudeness, and my eagerness to banish from Maj. Grantland's eyes the hurt look I had brought there. I rose hastily to ray feet as I made my little plea for pardon, and laid my hand appealingly and unthinkingly upon his sleeeve. The next instant I deeply regretted the action, for the officer looked down upon it with a face going red and white by turns. then with a quick little intake of breath he put his own hand warmly, possessively over mine. pressed it against his arm with a wift, little, passionate movement that startled me. Into his eyes, too; had come something that made me feel for an instant as if

There was no mistaking the meaning of either look or action. knew in that moment, and was deeply abased and remorseful before the knowledge, that though in all probability I should never be annoyed in the slightest degree by the young officer's feeling. I still had to face the rather apalling fact that he cared for me deeply, intensely, utterly hopeless

s he must know his emotion to In the days when we had been so dramatically thrown together in an experience that crowded a whole lifetime of acquaintance, understanding and comradeship into a short time-the days when he had not known, when there was no opportunity or reason to tell him that I was "maid wife op widow"-I had surmised toward the end of that hospital experience that he was more deeply 'nterested in me 'than I wished. But he, himself, by his cool, repressed manner, when after investigating the reason for Dicky's strange behavior, he advised me crisply to "trust my husband," had dispelled such a notion. This sudden revelation of his real feeling, so long and so sternly repressed, was a distinct shock to

Madge in Front. She turned toward the house, and with a sudden flash of comprehension I understood why she had fallen in so readily with a proposal of which I knew she really disapproved. Lillian has the widest comprehension, keenest insight of any woman I know. She had realized that to register any disapproval, even any critical notice of Mrs. Durkee's extravagant speech, was to attach an importance to it which would prove embarrassing for both Maj. Grantland and myself, With her customary energy she had taken the reins of the situation herself. I had no longer any qualms concerning the proposed rive.
