Lillian, after the introductions and the usual small talk following, tookthe reins of the situation in her own hands with her directness in verbiage usual stripped of frills. I had proviously assured her of Esther's absolute trustworthiness in kenning to herself anything which she might hear. "Mr. Walters," she said crisply, "of course you have guessed that it was not to play bridge that we invited you to come here tonight. Mrs. Graham and I wished to consult you upon a most important project connected with Mr. Stockbridge. Mrs. Graham assures me that your sister can and will keep her own counsel absolutely, but I am wondering if ter should also be present."

"I will fry to make my proposition clear, to you a little later," Lillian retorted good-humoredly. 'And of coure we are very glad to have Miss Walters present Shall we go into the library? She looked at me. "We shall be less likely to be disturbed there." I rose and led the way to the library without further comment. I think none of us felt in the mood for conversation.
