REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

CHAPTER 250

THE MEANS BY WHICH DR. PETTIT PUT MADGE AT HER EASE.

Dr. Pettit, intent upon his errand, evidently a most important one, hurried to the back of the pharmacy and called in a low tone that yet held the peremptory note I remembered so well:

"Mr. Crown."

The pharmacist came immediately from the middle room, adjusting his eyeglasses as he did so.

"Ah, Dr. Pettit!" he said genially. "In a hurry as usual, I see. I'll be with you as soon as I've finished a prescription."

"But this—" Dr. Pettit's voice dropped to a low murmur, of which I caught only the words, "imperative, hospital."

"In that case," Mr. Crown looked toward me. I saw that the moment of recognition was imminent. I might as well hasten it.

An Adroit Excuse.

"I shall be only too glad to give way to Dr. Pettit," I said demurely, walking toward the physician and holding out my hand. "How odd that we should meet out here," I added banally, angrily conscious that I was flushing under the queer, startled look which he bent upon me. His own face had drained of all color at my words, and his lips had formed but one hoarse monosyllable:

"You!"

The next instant, however, with an evident embarrassed consciousness of the curious gaze with which the genial pharmacist was naturally regarding us, he had released my hand—I firmly repressed a wince at the strength of his clasp—and was talking naturally.

"You must pardon me for my agitation, Mrs. Graham. You resemble so strongly a woman whom I knew well, was reported missing from her nursing work in France, and whom her friends had given up as lost, that for a moment I thought a miracle had happened, and that you were she. Naturally I was startled. But it is good to see you. How are your husband and that wonderful baby?"

He was telling a deliberate falsehood, and I knew it. But I also knew that he had desperately brought into the conversation some mythical woman in order that the druggist might not later comment mentally or orally upon "the doc's being all tumbled to pieces at the sight of that Mrs. Graham." I could imagine the swirl of gossip in the village, and was grateful to the physician for his adroitness even though his quickly connected tale was so bizarre a one.

"The usual stuff, I suppose, doctor?"

Mr. Crown struck in unobtrusively into the conversation. At this mild reminder of the emergency for which he had requested instant attention, the color came back into Dr. Pettit's face in a brick-red flush. He turned to the druggist quickly.

Dr. Pettit's Offer.

"Yes, yes, also this." He handed Mr. Crown a slip. "I've left my engine running."

"That means you want the stuff in about thirty seconds," Mr. Crown laughed. "Oh, I know you! But you'll have it in, say—two and a half minutes exactly."

He disappeared behind the partition and by a sudden impulse the physician and I moved toward the front of the store before we spoke again.

I was both annoyed and perturbed at this unexpected meeting. Dr. Pettit, despite his many sterling qualities, and the gratitude I owe him for his wonderful service to my father, is a most uncomfortable person to have in one's horizon. He is so intense, and takes life so seriously that his presence rather casts a damper upon any gathering. And then—I could not forget certain rather tense moments in my past experience when this man had betrayed a regard for me which was more than friendship, and had much embarrassed me.

Dicky's only too patent and unreasoning jealousy of the young physician had put into our friendship—necessarily more than an ordinary acquaintance because of Dr. Pettit's relations to my father—an uncomfortable note, and, thought I was rather ashamed of myself for my ungraciousness I had been heartily relieved when the physician had finally been released to depart for the medical training camp, and had himself invested his departure with the air of a final and decisive farewell to me.

What was to be his attitude now? I feared a touch of the old intenseness from his exclamation and pallor upon seeing me, felt a sudden distaste for the man and his emotions. In Dicky's parlance I was "a bit fed up on melodrama."

Dr. Pettit bent toward me, his face tense and drawn.

"Please," he said, "don't fear that I shall ever trouble you with that old foolishness. But also remember that I am at your service whenever you need me. You can get me at any minute. I'm helping out an old school friend here, who was gassed in the war. And —I'm not even going to ask you where you are staying. So you see you are safe from annoyance at my hands."
