If any such steps should be taken, however, in the opinion of General Daugherty, legislation probably would be necessary and in this case some difficulty might be encountered in congress. Needs of the railroads for more equipment is their own difficulty in the opinion of Secretary Hoover, who said it was up to the railroads to take the leadership in presenting some constructive plan for providing funds. The railroads' troubles, he asserted, "in anticipation." made relief measures difficult of adoption at this time. He expressed the belief that if the shortage of cars became sufficiently acute there would be pressure from all sides to remedy the situation. Under equipment of railroads, he said, had its effect in the employment situation and upon agricultural conditions. Secretary Mellon is also understood to coin-
