which she had hidden so long, the secret of her love for Kenneth Stockbridge, but which, alas for poor Alice, was now written on her face and eyes for anyone who could read it.

"If it will help—" The frightened look went out of her eyes, and she smiled a gallant little smile. "I will tell you anything I know," she said simply.

"No." "Do you know the circumstances of his first love affair?" "Yes."

"Would you mind telling me how?" Lillian's voice was soft, her eyes averted from the woman she was questioning, but as Alice Holcombe dropped her own eyes and faltered in her answer, she saw Lillian send a quick, keen glance at the other's face, and knew that Alice Holcombe's soul was under Lillian's mental scalpel as surely as her body would have been on the dissecting table.

"I had been his friend and schoolmate since we were little children, his chum, nothing sentimental, of course," her voice struck a gallant little note of defiance, "but he came to tell me all his troubles, and when the tragedy came into his life he naturally came to me because he had no sister of his own."

"I see. Of course," Lillian said in the most matter-of-fact way possible. "Now would you be breaking a confidence to tell me that old love story of Mr. Stockbridge's?" "If it will help him, I shall not consider it a broken confidence," she replied with dignity.

"The Question is—" And then for the next five minutes Lillian listened spellbound, as in graphic language the woman who loved Kenneth Stockbridge told the story of his first love affair, and of the accident which had terminated it, above all the suffering in mind and body the maimed boy had undergone. When she had finished I was openly wiping my eyes, although I had heard part of the story before and Lillian's face was stirred with grave sympathy.

"What a tragedy!" she said reflectively, and the infection in her voice robbed the words of banality. "But how in the world did he ever come to console himself with the woman he did?" From what Mrs. Graham tells me, she must have been the last word in unpleasantness, if she wasn't actually insane.

"I think her love for Kenneth drove her insane at last," Alice said gravely. "And as for his marriage, it is not a nice thing to say of a dead woman who was my friend, but—" "I'll say it for you," Lillian interposed grimly. "You mean that she set out deliberately to capture his heart on the rebound, that she tried the sympathetic dodge until she saw that wouldn't work, and then gave him the impression, seconded by her family, that she was going into a decline for the love of him. Of course Mr. Stockbridge being the chivalric sentimental type of idiot, fell for the whole thing with what the old dime novels used to say to call a 'dull, sickening thud'."

"How did you know?" Alice gasped. "Then she turned upon me. 'Did you—I've forgotten how much I told you—'" "She told me nothing about that end of it," Lillian retorted. "I didn't want to be mixed up on the thing. But I've seen dozens of just such tragedies. I tell you a woman of that type needs to be smothered in her cradle." She stopped, pondered a moment, then said abruptly: "Of course he never cared two pins about her. The question is, did he ever learn to care for any other woman? Do you know?" (To be continued)

terian church of Zena, Or., where impressive services were held, conducted by the Rev. Ward Willis Long, pastor of the Salem Presbyterian church, and the remains were laid to rest in the family lot joining the church, which nestle among the Polk county hills overlooking the beautiful Spring valley, the former home of the deceased.

A large gathering of neighbors and friends came to pay their last respects. The floral tributes were many and beautiful. There were two vocal selections feelingly rendered by Mr. and Mrs. Scott of Zena.

Mrs. Patrick was a woman of quiet taste and devoted herself largely to her home and family, however never to busy in her own home to offer assistance to others whenever needed. In early life she professed saving faith in Christ, and remained true to her vows until death claimed her. In life, likewise in death, her faith was unwavering. She was a companion to the young as well as to those of riper years. And when but little time was left her here, and she talked of leaving this life, she likened it to going on a pleasant visit to loved ones, after every detail of her journey had been provided for. So death seemed the peaceful slipping away to rest after duties well done and a life well spent. She was 90 years old November 27, 1921. —Mrs. W. N. Savae.

Hampton's At Eugene Purchased by Solofs

Mr. and Mrs. Max Solof, proprietors of the People's Cash store here, purchased the Hampton store in Eugene and will open to the public about April 1. They announced that Louis Solof, who has been associated here with the local store, will assume the management in Eugene.

A complete stock of general merchandises will be handled and the store will be operated under the same general policy as the Salem store. "The opening of the Eugene store will mean larger buying power and considerable benefit will be afforded the people of Salem as well as the new patrons in the southern city," Max Solof explained. The People's Cash store being the most widely advertised merchants in the Willamette valley, will find ready support by ardent admirers who are familiar with its policies and record made here. The people of Salem as a whole will wish them success and prosperity which no doubt they will deservedly enjoy.
