MY HEART AND MY HUSBAND

Adelle Garrison's New Phase of REVELATIONS OF A WIFE CHAPTER 335 THE AID THAT CAME TO LILLIAN

Jake Wilsey whirled and his jaw dropped for an instant as he confronted Lillian, who had come up so noiselessly from her vantage place in the thicket nearby that he had not known she was there until she spoke. He recovered himself instantly, however, thrust out a pugnacious jaw and growled menacingly: "And who the h—l are you?" "You'll know all in good time," Lillian promised pleasantly. "That is, if I decide it is advisable to tell you. In the mean time it will be amply sufficient for our purpose if we find out who you are."

"Think you're quite a humorist, don't you?" Jake Wilsey retorted. "Well, that kind of stuff don't go down with me! And as I've got serious business with these dames, suppose you toddle along and mind your own business."

"Suppose you listen to me!" Lillian's voice was like a whip lash, and I saw the man look startled at the note in it which with Lillian always commands respect and a hearing.

"You seem to be overly fond, my friend, of traveling around under different names. Now, some of them are harmless and some are not."

"Did I imagine it or did a look of fear leap into the bold, hard eyes of the man confronting her?" "For instance," Lillian said slowly, pretending to consult a little card in her hand, "the name of George Bridgeham hasn't any record behind it that amounts to very much, neither has John Hambridge. And as for your real name, Mr. Jake Wilsey, as long as you stay away from the vicinity of Sag Harbor that won't do you any harm. But now, let's see—ah! Yes, the name of Harry Conway is something else again."

"Damnation!" The oath escaped him as if involuntarily, and I saw him put up his hand and wipe great beads of sweat from his forehead. Then he attempted to brazen it out. "What are you giving me, anyway? Can the comedy, now?" "All Right, Shoot."

wondered if she saw and read their glare aright. She pondered for a moment, looking steadily at him as if puzzled. Then her face lighted. "How much does the prosecution know of this?" His face fell for an instant, then he swaggered a bit. "Not a d—d thing," he said. "Those guys couldn't find a rat in a trap. So I didn't give up anything I got by myself until I saw—"

"Where you could sell it best," Lillian interrupted. As she spoke I saw her eyes leave his for a moment and stray to the little footbridge along which Robert Savarin was walking, evidently in search of us. Wilsey, whose back was toward Savarin, saw nothing but his opportunity, and he sprang across the little summer house like a tiger, drawing a loaded "billy" from his pocket as he sprang. "Lillian!" I screamed, as I plunged forward and caught the hand with the billy. Alice Holcombe was only a second behind me, and we clung to the man's arm with a grip of born desperation. He hurled us away from him with such force that we fell violently against the railing.

I was almost stunned, but I had vision enough left to see Robert Savarin running wildly forward, but forestalling him—coming on the balls of his feet like the trained athlete he is—Harry Underwood dashed out of the surrounding shrubbery. (To be continued)

Trees Being Removed From University Campus Work was begun Monday morning to dig out the maples bordering the Willamette campus on State street. The trees had been badly damaged by having some of their roots cut when the street was paved, so that they have been slowly dying for some years past. Occasionally a seemingly sound limb would snap in the wind, and there was a perpetual menace to passers-by from this cause. One Salem woman not long ago came near a serious if not fatal injury, by a falling branch of these weakened trees. It was finally decided to take them all out, and replace them with a rose hedge, in the parking between the walk and the curb. A group of doughty woodsmen offered to take out the trees for $1.75 apiece Monday morning, but they were forced to accept $2.25 on the ground that their bid was too low. They worked awhile, long enough to find that even the $2.25 wasn't a money maker, and they threw up the job, which is now being done on a time account basis. It's a good deal of a job to clear out trees of that size, and leave the ground smooth for a velvet lawn. Inside the walk, on the campus proper, new trees will be planted; white birch for part of the planting, though there may be some other varieties also.

Boy Center of Suit— Levi W. Hammer, father of William F. Hammer, a minor, yesterday substituted mandamus proceeding in Marion county circuit court against Mr. and Mrs. John Haines, of Silverton, who, the complaint alleges, are keeping possession of the little boy although they have no court authority or legal basis for such procedure, it is alleged. Mr. Hammer in the mandamus proceeding, states that the boy's mother is dead. Mr. and Mrs. Haines have refused to surrender custody of William F. Hammer, it is stated.
