Representatives of Construction Association Confer With Brumbaugh

Karl K. Lively and James J. Sayer of Portland were in Salem yesterday conferring with the secretary of the bonus commission on problems relating to the construction of homes under the provisions of the bonus law.

Mr. Lively is chairman and Mr. Sayer is a member of a special committee of the Oregon Association of Building and Construction appointed by Ellis F. Lawrence, president to cooperate with the bonus commission in carrying out the provisions of the bonus law with respect to the construction of homes.

National Connection Held
The Oregon association is affiliated with the National Congress of the Building and Construction Industry, organized for the purpose of bringing together architects, contractors, material and supply men, and others directly or indirectly covered with the building and construction industry. The local association has evidenced great interest in the provision of the bonus law referring to the construction of homes, and according to Captain Brumbaugh, secretary of the bonus commission, the special committee as well as individual members has rendered valuable service to the commission in the way of advice and information in working out the details necessary in the administration of this particular phase of the law.

Committee Named
The special committee of the association that will deal with all matters relating to the operation of the bonus law consists of Karl Lively of McCarger, Bates & Lively, chairman; James J. Sayer, secretary of the Portland association of Building Owners and Managers E. W. Jorgensen, city editor of the Portland News; C. D. James, of the Portland Institute of Architects, and C. J. Parker of Parker & Banfield.

Applicants for loans under the bonus law who expect to build with the proceeds of the loan will be furnished by this committee upon request with all information as to procedure, will be put in touch with contractors, will be advised how to secure acceptable plans at a minimum cost, and will be otherwise assisted in taking full advantage of the privileges allowed under this section of the law.

me. None knew better than I the "ancient grudge" she bore me. And I doubted not that she would "feed it fat" at the first opportunity.

With Grace Draper free I never again would know a moment's real peace or safety. For I should never know from what direction or in what way her vengeance was coming. I could only be sure—knowing her as I did, knowing also how intense was her hatred against me—that she would endeavor to harm me in some way. Whether her revenge would take the form of an attempt at physical injury to me and mine, or whether I would suffer from the more subtle injuries to my peace of mind, of which she was past mistress, I could not tell, and the uncertainty was an added terror.

I straightened myself in my chair and looked at her steadily. "I am ready for whatever is before me," I said slowly. "But you must answer my question first. Is Grace Draper free from prison?"

"Yes, she was released two days ago," Lillian answered slowly, pitifully.

I saw nothing, heard nothing for the next few seconds. I knew that my fingers were clenched in my chair, and felt Lillian's arms clasp me closely. I had one overmastering thought, that I mustn't cry out, but must hold myself steady to face this terrible thing which had come to me.

HOLDING A HUSBAND

I had startled both Lillian and Allen Drake by my question. I knew this by the quick glance of inquiry they threw at each other, though the poise of each prevented any other betrayal of their astonishment.

Lillian was the first to speak. "What has put Grace Draper into your mind, Madge?" she asked quietly.

There was neither assent nor negative to my stormy question, simply the quiet query, but I knew at that moment, I think, that my fantastic fears were confirmed.

"Because I saw her or somebody who looked just like her, getting into a limousine at the Pennsylvania station tonight." Again the startled exchange of glances. It was Mr. Drake who spoke next.

"Did this woman who resembled Miss Draper see you?" he asked, and despite the quiet composure of his voice I fancied I detected a note of anxiety in it.

"No, no," I returned impatiently, "but all this is beside the main question. Is she out of prison—free to make my life the torment it used to be?"

I am not particularly proud of my behavior in this instance. And I am sure my voice must have sounded hysterical. At any rate, Lillian rose quickly, crossed to my chair, knelt protectively beside me and took my hands in hers.

"Surely, you're not going to be anything but your usual brave self no matter what has happened, are you, Madge?" she whispered in my ear.

How well she knows me. I feel sometimes in my reflective moments as if Lillian when she wishes, plays upon my mind and heart as she would upon the keyboard of an instrument with which she was familiar. And she again had struck the right note with me. I couldn't play the craven with Lillian's voice sounding that slogan in my ears.

AN ATTRACTIVE WATCHER

I think the first thing outside of Lillian's protecting arms of which I was conscious was the sight of Allen Drake's face. He stood by the fireplace, motionless, watchful, his demi-tasse of coffee held rigidly in his hand halfway to his lips, evidently arrested in his interest in my reception of the news. I remember thinking—as one will observe something trivial in the most tragic hour—that almost any other man would have looked supremely ridiculous in such an attitude. But he, curiously enough, lost none of his dignity in either the posture or the quick movement with which, with realization and consciousness in my gaze, he put the cup on the mantel and came toward me.

"I knew you could do it," he said, and there was distinct admiration in his tone. "I know what a blow this must be to you, and I express not only my sympathy, but my admiration for the way you are taking it. And let me tell you this. While that woman is a menace, of course, yet her venom shall never reach you if I can prevent it, and I think I can."

"You will never get anywhere unless you have higher ideals than this," preached the woman to whose door the tramp had applied for assistance. "Are you really content to spend your life walking around the country begging?"

"No, lady," answered Weary Willie. "Many's the time I've wished I had an auto."—Legion Weekly.
