By MARGUERITE GLEESON

MRS. McDONALD SPENCER, prominent in social and musical circles in Portland, was hostess at a charming musical and tea last Friday at which Mrs. William H. Burghardt Jr., of Salem gave a delightfully varied musical program.

The guests were a small group of women prominent in musical circles and formed a most appreciative audience for the program which included several modern pieces which as well as other older and better known.

Mrs. A. S. Kerry and Mrs. William McGivney served at the tea table and Mrs. William Purcell, Mrs. Anderson Cannon, Mrs. Dent

Mowery and Mrs. W. E. Thomas assisted in the dining and living rooms. Mrs. Clifford Brown and Mrs. John J. Roberts from Salem were among those present.

Mrs. Burghardt has given a number of musical affairs within the last few months and is devoting considerable time at the present time to work with the chorus of the oratorio "Creation" which will be given May 26. Mrs. Burghardt is accompanist for the chorus.

The program given Friday by Mrs. Burghardt was as follows:

Rhapsody in G Minor... Brahms
Clair de lune... Stacherbachoff
Clair de lune... Debussy
Jardins sous la pluie... Debussy
Nocturne... Karganoff
Pavane... Ravel
(On the death of a royal child)
Etude en Octaves... Campbell-Tipton

Mrs. Blake's Favorite Recipe

No-Egg Mayonnaise Dressing

I have found this method of making mayonnaise both convenient and economical:

1 tsp. salt, 2 tsp. Carnation Milk, 1 cup oil, 1 tsp. paprika, 1 step. lemon juice or vinegar.

Put salt and paprika in a bowl; add Carnation Milk and mix thoroughly; add oil slowly, stirring constantly. Then add the lemon juice or vinegar. This recipe makes 1 cup salad dressing.

been sentenced to death.

Mother Graham's Excitement.

My mother-in-law had never suspected that Katie's departure scheduled for a day or two after ours, had been intended only as a vacation. She fancied that it had been her own fitness and influence which had induced the girl to stay with us, and was much pleased with herself over the feat. The lesson has had its effect, however. She treated Katie with far more consideration than before, and although she still did not wholly cease her strictures to me on my little maid's real or fancied shortcomings, yet she was much less virulent than she had been.

Even the house cleaning, that old-time ceremonial in which she indulges herself and terrorizes the rest of the family on every formal occasion, was dwarfed in her mind by the excitement of the coming trip. And though one could not call her placid—my cautious mother-in-law can never be that—yet she was in royal good humor, for her, though her questions and exactions about the coming trip nearly drove me wild.

"Margaret," she said one day, coming into the sewing room, where I was frantically running the sewing machine in an attempt to do a little necessary sewing for Junior and myself before our departure, an attempt which seemed foredoomed to failure on account of the influenza seizure of the dressmaker, who had been engaged for Lella's more pretentious things. "I can't figure out a trunk for the linen and bedding anywhere."

The Treasure Trunk.

It was a question which I had been expecting for some time, and I mentally prepared for battle. I have three trunks. One, the wardrobe trunk, on which I spent an extravagant lot of money just before my marriage, to house my modest trousseau. The second, a practical, small steamer, which is all I have ever required since my marriage. And the third, a large, old-fashioned trunk belonging to my mother, which always stands in my room, and in which I keep all my personal mementoes and intimate possessions.

It is an ideal trunk for packing the table and bed linens and extra blankets which the renting of a summer cottage entails, for it is strongly made in a fashion unknown to modern craftsmanship. But I resolved long ago that it was too intimately associated with my little mother ever to be used for anything save the purpose for which I have it.

Many mementoes of my mother are contained in it, my most treasured doll is tucked away in its depths, together with Junior's first pair of baby shoes, Dicky's few love letters, the violets he gave me the day we were engaged, my wedding bouquet—why enumerate? Every woman with a spark of sentiment in her has a similar chest, and could list its contents from memory.

Next to the living members of my household do I hold that trunk. I have privately instructed Katie and Jim in case of fire to save that first, and look after the silver and china and our few valuable pieces of furniture afterward. And I had already gained permission of Alice Holcombe to leave the trunk at her house during our absence. So it was with a feeling of girding myself for a fray that I answered my mother-in-law in sweetly modulated terms:

"That is too bad, but I am sure we can arrange for something."

"Of course we can," she retorted. "There is just one trunk in the house which will do, and that is that old, big one in your bedroom. I have ordered a packing box from that little dry goods store on Merrick road. It will be here in half an hour and then you can transfer the things you have in it to that. I want to pack the linens right after luncheon."

WHAT MOTHER GRAHAM UNWISELY TOOK FOR GRANTED.

I think the promises of Lillian and Allen Drake that harm should not come to me through Grace Draper were all that kept me from a nervous collapse in the days immediately following the girl's release from prison. I could see nothing else but her beautiful, mocking face, set my mind to nothing save conjecture as to the manner in which she would first attempt to harm me.

It was fortunate indeed for me that the preparations for Lella Fairfax's wedding were so complicated for all of us. We had definitely decided to take a cottage at Cedar Crest, three miles from the home of Lella's aunt, for a month, and what with Lella's frantic efforts to complete her trousseau, Mother Graham's insistence upon having the house cleaned from attic to cellar before we left—although Katie always keeps it in neat order—Dicky's fussiness concerning the things he wished to take with him, and my own preparations for the trip, I would have had no time to think of my coming execution if I had
