CHAPTER 40

WHAT MADGE DID WHEN HER FATHER READ THE LAST LETTER.

I drew an easy chair close to my sewing table as unobtrusively as I could manage the action, slipped my arm through my father's and pushed him gently into it. I don't think he even noticed what I was doing, so absorbed was he in the packet of my mother's old letters which he held in his hand.

which he invariably addressed her, was the diminutive "Sweet." I guessed that it had fitted her perfectly. After hours of close communion with my dead mother's letters the sudden sight of me had for a moment completely unshipped his brain.

I stood motionless in his clasp, for I feared the effect of a single enlightening word. But in another minute the reaction came.

With a wild glance of realization my father sank back into his chair, and with head bowed upon his hands burst into the choking, heart-rending sobs which come to a man but once or twice in a lifetime.

And as I held him close, smoothed his hair and brought him gradually back to calmness again there came to me the feeling that I was not alone in my ministrations.

NEW YORK, June 5.—Offerings of market leaders frequently exceeded the buying power on the stock exchange today, these conflicting movements causing considerable uncertainty or unsettlement throughout the active session. Cross currents were most pronounced among the popular ails, steels, rails and numerous miscellaneous stocks. Early declines of 1 to 4 points in such issues were balanced by gains of like extent, but the forces of reaction were in control at the market's close. Sales amounted to 1,200,000 shares.

Incidents over the week-end, notably the publicity given to the promotion phases of the Republic-Midvale-Inland steel merger and the extravagant speculation of pools in comparatively obscure specialties, provoked fresh short selling and liquidation for the long account.

Detective—But didn't you feel the thief's hand going into your pocket?
 Absent-Minded Prof.—Yes, but I thought it was my own.
