WHY MADGE HATED TO DE-CLINE THE COURTESY MAJ. GRANTLAND OFFERED.

I am afraid I stared in openmouthed amazement for a moment at Maj. Grantland's question concerning the railroad drawing room. Then enlightenment came to me. Mrs. Durkee, of course! "Her fluffiness must have lost no time in telling him. I was thankful that my good- express his thoughts of me, but little words, voice, eyes said only too hearted, well-meaning reach. I do not believe I could have trusted my fingers which itched to box her ears. "I-I-trust I am not interfering in something which I should not," the young officer stammered, evidently disconcerted by my look, "but Mrs. Durkee told me today of her very natural objecwith Miss Brown, and of your goodness in offering to change with her."

tonation of stress upon the words 'very natural objections," clearly betraying disapproval of Rita Brown, which gave me material for mental digestion when I should have time for such a rumfnative process. I had time, der as to whether concern for Edith Fairfax had anything to do with his attitude toward Miss Brown, for Major Grantland was speaking again, his embarrassment more patent than ever in the brick red flush which was covering his face. It seemed absurd that a man who could face danger, any emergency with iron nerve and unmoved facial muscles should be so schoolboyish in his attitude toward women, but I must confess that I-in common with other women who know himfind something oddly appealing in

"I chided her for not coming to me instead of annoying you with the matter," he went on rapidly, and his use of the pronoun, me unmistakably what it troubled me to believe, that the young officer still held me in his thoughts as one from whom all care and even annoyance should be kept as much as possible. "But she evidently had not realized that I have a certain facility—an inside track, as it were, in getting things from railroads, and so had nct confided her dilemma to me."

The Major Hesitates.

He paused, evidently to arrange his words, which he seemed to have increasing difficulty in framing. I remembered his railroad history before he entered the war, and the brilliance and the power of h's standing during the great conflict, and I would not have marvelled if he had suddenly produced an order for a private car or even a train His next words echoed my
