MRS. Ercel Kay led the field with low gross in the first inter-sectional golf match for women played Wednesday on the Portland golf links. Seven women composed the team which was matched against a team from the Yakima Country club. Mrs. Kay's playing was described as faultless and she turned in a card of 86. She was matched against Mrs. H. F. Luhman, champion of the Yakima team.

Mrs. Pat Allen was captain of the Portland team. Other members were Mrs. James Nicol, Mrs. C. N. Sampson, Mrs. A. C. Callan, Mrs. C. V. Strater, Mrs. A. H. Meyers.

Following the match, a special luncheon was served at the club house for the visiting golfers. They then left by motor for Olympia, where they are playing the Olympia women's team today. Before returning home they will play a match at the Aberdeen Country club.

The fair visitors were loud in their praises of both the Portland club and the Waverly club courses. They took part in a mixed doubles tournament Tuesday at Waverly.

A pretty breakfast party at the Delta Phi house yesterday was given in honor of Miss Rose Shindler who announced her engagement to Carl Snider. The table was decked with sweet peas in various hues and the guests included those who are making their home at the Delta Phi house during the summer.

Delicious muffins contained tiny hearts with the announcement. Miss Shindler is a member of the circulation department of the Oregon Statesman and Mr. Snider is employed at the state house. His home is in Portland. Miss Shindler is from Albany. The wedding has not been definitely set but will be next spring.

Those included for the breakfast besides Miss Shindler were Miss Virginia Mason, Miss Grace Brainard, Mrs. Pauline Josse, Miss Marion Zinzer and Dr. Owens Adair.

Mrs. F. A. Elliott has as her guest an aunt, Mrs. F. L. Long of Illinois. Mrs. E. C. Simmons of Los Angeles is also a guest at the Elliott home.

Mr. and Mrs. David A. Wright drove to Portland yesterday to meet their daughters, Eloise and Eleanor, who have been visiting for three weeks in eastern Oregon.

Miss Eliza Nolan is visiting with friends in Portland and will return early in the week.

Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Prunk are home following a short vacation trip to Buell where they were guests of Mr. and Mrs. H. Saxon.

Mr. and Mrs. Herbert L. Stiff and little son, Herbert, Jr., have gone to Seattle for the annual buyers week.

Mrs. Ralph Coleman and Miss Victoria Cobil of Corvallis visited during the week with Miss Mary Elizabeth Bayne.

Rev. and Mrs. J. J. Evans and daughter, Margaret, are spending a week's vacation at Waldport.

Mrs. T. B. Handley will leave next week for the beaches where with the two Handley children, Louise and Tommy, she will spend a month. Mr. Handley will join them later.

Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Schramm of Corvallis were guests at the P. J. Kuntz home early in the week.

CLUBS AND WOMEN'S ACTIVITIES

Mrs. Ida B. Callahan was chosen first vice president of the Inter-Mountain and Pacific Coast Federation of Women's Clubs at the recent national federation convention in New York. Mrs. Callahan is serving her second term as president of the Oregon state federation and attended the national meeting as a representative of Oregon club women. The divisional federation is a branch of the national organization. A difference in the type of problems confronting the women of the west caused the formation of this division.

The Aid society of the First Presbyterian church will meet this afternoon at 2:30 in Marion Square. A social time will be enjoyed.

Among the many friends of Mrs. Ellen Feidt who extended felicitations to her on her 83rd birthday were the following: Louisa King, Ella Craggett, Evelyn Brenner, Catherine Ingrey, Pearl E. Nichols, Elsie B. Simeral, Florence Viesko, Lillie M. Drager, Lillian Fleener, Florence Yarnell, Desalene Eberhart, Mrs. Headrick and daughter, Eugenia

CHAPTER 83

WHAT DICKY SAID TO MADGE ABOUT MAJ. GRANTLAND.

I held my breath tensely, nervously as I waited for Dicky's reply to Rita Brown's audacious request for the return to her of Maj. Grantland's wonderful coat. Instinctively I felt that underneath my husband's tender care of me in my sudden illness lay the same aversion to Maj. Grantland which had troubled me before. That the feeling was intensified whenever he saw the luxurious cloak which the officer's thoughtfulness had provided for my motor journey to New York I knew from an involuntary glance or two I had seen him give it. What answer would this secret irritation lead him to give to the selfish, vulgar girl accosting him? I anxiously hoped that it would be nothing which would betray his real feeling toward Maj. Grantland. That would delight Rita Brown's mischief-making soul. But with his first words I realized that, whatever his real feelings, Rita Brown would not be allowed the slightest clue to them.

"Can the comedy, Rita," I heard him drawl. "Where do you get that line about the coat Grantland lent you?" He stressed the pronoun almost insolently. "There's only one coat not our own in here, and that's the one old Hughie took along when he motored down to Marvin to bring Madge to New York."

"I know," the girl retorted defiantly, "but he afterward lent it to me."

"At your old tricks again, aren't you, Rita?" Dicky said, and there was an understanding in his voice that set me to wondering. "But you ought to know better than to try anything on me, and—let me give you a pointer—don't bank too much on old Hughie's guilelessness. I'll admit he's a naive soul in some things, but—he's seen your type in action before, so go a bit wary. Now run along, for the tea will be getting cold."

He passed through the door just in time to prevent his mother from snatching the tray from his hands. Her dislike of Rita Brown and her solicitude for me had intensified her natural impatience at the delay.

There was no need for speculation as to the feelings of Miss Brown. The door had not closed quickly enough to shut out the imprecation which the girl fairly spat out at him.

"Curse you!" she whispered venomously, careful even in her wrath to keep her voice discreet, and Dicky laughed lightly as he bore the tray to the side of the berth.

"I'm afraid I put poor Rita in a bit of a wax," he said, "but she needs a warning. She'll never manage to work Hughie for that cloak no matter how she maneuvers."

"Richard!"

"Richard!"

His mother and I gasped his name together. "You don't mean that she—"

"Would accept the gift of that cloak?" Dicky replied carelessly. "Will a cat steal cream? You don't know Rita Brown."

"Nor do I want to," snapped his mother, who had been busying herself in pouring out and preparing my cup of tea. "Now, Richard, sit back of Margaret, and prop her up against your shoulder while I feed her this."

For the next few minutes I revelled in the comfort of the wonderful care and attention given to me. I felt much refreshed by the hot food, but I was weaker than I thought. And when I had disposed of the tea and toast I found that I was glad enough to be lowered from Dicky's arms to my pillow again.

"Tired, girl?" Dicky asked solicitously.

"A little," I admitted smiling at him.

"How are we going to get her off this train?" he demanded worriedly of his mother.

"There are enough of you to carry her off if necessary," she snapped, "but—as she saw my involuntary look of alarm—that won't be necessary. The train is late, isn't it?"

"Five hours, at least," Dicky answered. "We won't get in until nearly midnight."

"All the better," his mother returned with astonishing optimism for her. "All she needs is sleep and rest right here. The later she can defer dressing the better. You'll see she'll be able to walk off the train tonight. But you must make sure there is somebody to meet us or else wire for accommodations at a hotel for tonight."

"Oh, no hotel!" I protested faintly. "I want to get to our own quarters."

"All right, you shall," Dicky declared promptly. "I'll put old Hughie on the telegraphing end. He's a wire shark, and he knows this railroad country like a book."

"I wish you'd give that cloak back to him," I went on. "I don't need it any more."

My husband looked at me keenly, then glanced at his mother. I think his eyes held a signal, for she promptly left the room with a hurried excuse about "seeing to Richard Second."

"Look here, sweetheart," Dicky said, when the door had closed behind her, "you've got me wrong about this cloak thing. I don't like Grantland, and I can't help knowing he's hipped about you, and, naturally, I don't like anything he does for you. But you're ill, and everything goes by the board. You need that cloak till you get to your destination, and even if Grantland didn't want you to have it he'd have to take it away only over my dead body. See?"

"I saw" and was glad that Dicky did not in return realize what I did, that part of my sudden dislike of the cloak lay in the knowledge that Rita Brown was endeavoring to obtain it as a gift from Maj. Grantland.

Rains Undermine D. & R. G. Tracks

PUEBLO, Colo., July 27.—A heavy rain, almost reaching the proportions of a cloudburst, undermined 200 feet of the Denver and Rio Grande Western track seven miles south of Castle Rock, Colo., late this afternoon, according to local railroad officials. All trains are delayed several hours, although southbound trains are now running over the northbound tracks around the washout. Wrecking crews expect to have the track passable early tomorrow morning.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS PICNIC TOMORROW

Advance Reports Indicate Larger Attendance Than at 1921 Event

Advance reports from the Sunday school scouts all over Marion county indicate that there will be more people and more enthusiasm and more fried chickens at the big picnic Saturday than there were at the record-breaking picnic last year.

It is not possible, according to President Fred DeVries, of the county association, to tell exactly what all schools will be in the line of march, but he expects the larger number of the almost 90 schools of the county to be represented. Some of them will come in large numbers and prepared to make a hot fight for the parade prize.

Decorated cars are to come down from Portland, representing the Multnomah County Sunday school association and also the state association. Some other out-of-the-county visitors are expected.

Judge Jacob Kanzler of the Multnomah county court of domestic relations is to be the principal speaker at the state fair grounds auditorium. The games will be held in the stadium. Bob Boardman of the Y. M. C. A. is to put in all day today with whatever help he needs to get the game grounds plotted out so that the sports can move along rapidly and cheerfully.
