CHAPTER 161

WHY TIM WAS SO EAGER TO GET AWAY

'Is there any answer, lady.' I looked up with a start from the astonishing letter which Grace Draper had written me. I had een so absorbed in the amazing plea for pardon the girl had sent me that I had completely forgotten her messenger until his nervously spoken question recalled him to my consciousness. That the man was more than fear of something, or of some one, anxious to complete his mission and get away from my vicinity, was easily to be seen. The most unobservant person could not have helped noticing his furtive glances, his twisting hands. lips with his tongue, as if their dryness would otherwise make seech impossible to him. I looked at him steadily, determined, it possible, to wrest some clue from him as to Grace Draper's where abouts.

With Hugh Grantland's assur ance that she was no longer in my vicinity, I had somehow gained the impression that she had been compelled to go back to New York, yet here was this man talking of taking an answer to her.

"Where is the woman who sternly.

"Please don't ask me that. ma'am," he returned, with a ouch of dignity that sat oddly pon his shambling personality. It passed my promise I wouldn't tell that. But she said I could tell that.
