Better Look This Up— "What is the name of the show now playing at the Oregon theater?" It is going to be worth a ticket to at least four people every day, when the Oregon manager takes four names at random from the telephone directory and calls to find out. He will probably know the right answer himself, but the four people who answer correctly, and at once, without waiting to hunt it up or send some one to look, is going to have a good new ticket to that very show. Just go down to the theater box office, present the name and the phone number, and the ticket is handed over with thanks. The Oregon theater ad will carry the announcement of the winners of the last day's calls.

He Hauled The Dirt— C. Van Patton, in charge of the construction for the new Northwest Cannery at South Liberty and Ferry streets, is digging up some old dirt that he recognizes as an old friend. It is some of the first he hauled into the old ravine when he began his building career in Salem, more than 30 years ago. Some of those who have looked into the yawning hole back of the armory, have wondered who started to dig the big well and ran out of money. It wasn't a hole. It was the bottom of the ravine, and it was all that deep until part of it was filled in. An astonishing amount of dirt has been filled into the place, 10 feet or more deep. Most of it is now being dug out again, for the basement of the new cannery.

ESCAPED CONVICT
 Masquerading as Pilgrim
Watch Out for Him

1875 her home has been in Salem. Mrs. Applegate never forgot her old Springfield home and loved to think of the hillside, where she played, being consecrated by the grave of Abraham Lincoln, for he is buried on the old Watson estate. Mrs. Applegate leaves six children: three sons, Warren, Glen and Arthur M., and three daughters, Lillian G., Mrs. Cyrus B. Woodworth and Pearl Lucile; a brother, Sanford Watson, and one sister, Miss Cecelia Watson, survive her. She was a great reader and kept up a keen interest in national as well as international affairs until her illness ten days ago. Funeral services from Rigdon's today at 1:30 p. m.
