LOWELL UNRUH LAID TO REST

All Nature in Tune With Spirit of Lad Who Passed to Other Side

A large number of friends gathered at the Terwilliger home Tuesday afternoon to pay the last tribute to the late Lowell Unruh, who died on Sunday and was buried Tuesday. It was a beautiful day; the birds outside were singing; the little canary in the funeral parlor sang as if it were a glad holiday, and the spring sun shone in like the dawn of delight—there in the house of mourning.

The deceased had been for two years an employe of The Statesman. He was a good employe, too; faithful, cheerful, progressive. Sunshine at one's work is rare enough. Lowell was one of the sunny ones whose going ought to be symbolized by sunshine and bird-songs and general outdoors. He did not live a grouch, and there was no gloom when he passed away. He had professed a firm Christian belief before he died. He said it meant springtime, to step over into the other world—and the day was beautifully fitting.

He had been working hard on music, with the promise of developing an extraordinary tenor voice. Such voices are rare; they hardly seem possible, even when they do appear. He had seemed to be extraordinarily strong, and his illness and death came as a shock to all who had known him.

Rev. Thomas Acheson of Jason Lee Methodist church preached the funeral sermon. A mixed quartet sang two beautiful songs, "Abide With Me," and "Asleep in Jesus," and Floyd McIntyre sang "Face to Face." The house was crowded with friends of the deceased and of his family, who came to pay a sincere tribute to his memory.

For 1000 years little worth while has come out of the Orient, the birthplace of the arts, of paganism and of religion. Civilization had lost the power of reproduction in Asia before the civilization of the New World was born.

As one studies the Russian revolution closely no master mind appears; it was the work of many pigmies, not of a giant.

Stanford Has Government Experiment Station Now
STANFORD UNIVERSITY, Cal. March 27.—Stanford's nearest approach to an agricultural school is a government experiment station recently established on a 20-acre plot on the university grounds by William F. Wight, Stanford graduate and a representative of the United States department of agriculture. Wight had planted about 800 hybrid trees, for the most part almonds, pears, peaches, plums, prunes and apricots. In his experiments Wight expects to perfect a variety of almonds with not only a soft shell and a kernel of good quality, but one, which has the hardness to resist extreme weather and the tendency to bloom too late.

It is thought that Stanford will never more closely approach agriculture than in this department, as the university founding grant provides for the furthering of only the older sciences. The experiment station comes under the head of research and might therefore be classed as botany, biology or other natural sciences.
