CHAPTER 274.
WHY IT TOOK THREE PERSONS TO RELIEVE MRS. DURKEE'S CONSCIENCE

I need not have feared for Lella. As her mother-in-law threw open the door of her room, with a triumphant childish gesture that said plainly, "Just see what I've done!" the pretty bride stood still for a minute. Her eyes roved over the exquisite room with its rose draperies, its every detail worked out in her favorite color, while the air was deliciously scented with the perfume of the roses which completed the decoration. Then she turned with a girlish squeal of delight:

"Oh, Al! Look at what mother has done!" she called, then she put her arms tight around her mother-in-law.

"You precious darling," she said lovingly. "I never had such a beautiful surprise in my life. And everything in my favorite color, too. How you must have worked to accomplish it."

Little Mrs. Durkee's face changed piteously. I saw her glance furtively at Edith Fairfax, who was regarding her with a look of cool detached appraisal, then appealingly to Lillian and me, standing together a few feet from her. I knew of what she was afraid, that Edith Fairfax would tell Lella of the original decorations which had been in this room, and would paint the preparations for the bride's reception in far different colors than the rosy hues through which Lella was now surveying them.

"I—I—" she stammered. I struck in impetuously, angering beyond discretion at the look on Edith Fairfax's face.

"I Mean Just That."
"This doesn't begin to express half the work, Lella," I said impressively. "When you know what this little woman really has done, you'll hug her tighter than ever. You know, of course, that she's really only about 10 years old." I laughed fondly at my little friend whose eyes were fixed on me with the expression of a child who inadvertently has been imprisoned in a room and sees a rescuer approaching.

"You do her wrong," Dicky put in. "Seven and a half."
"And she got mixed up on your favorite colors." I went on ignoring Dicky's interruption. "This room was the most exquisite thing last night, but it wasn't in your colors. You'll have to look in her own room for the color scheme that was here as late as this morning to the last detail."

"You don't mean she changed it, with all this work?" Lella exclaimed breathlessly.

"I mean just that," I returned steadfastly, fortified by the slight curl of Edith Fairfax's lips, and the flash of exasperation which I had seen in her eyes as she turned them on me for a sec-

Where is the Cracker Barrel Crowd?
Abraham Lincoln first discovered his persuasive powers while addressing the cracker barrel crowd around the stove in the rear of the country store.

In these days a storekeeper could rely on this sort of personal contact as a means of advertising his service and what he had to sell. But the cracker barrel days have passed. Cracker barrels are clean, sanitary, individual packages and incidentally advertising has been the means of educating the public to demand the improved methods of marketing that protect health.

We can't talk to 30,000 people around a cracker barrel, and that's why we tell you about modern improved methods of dentistry through the newspapers.

We want you to know more about the method of removing the pain and suffering from dental treatment. IT CAN be done. And it is being done right here in our office every day.

Twilight Sleep

THERE IS NO HURT.
