

HOLDING A HUSBAND

Adèle Garrison's New Phase of REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Question That Puzzled and Piqued Madge.

Dicky's lips clamped together in a thin line at Lillian's aspersions on his working habits. If any one else in the world but Lillian had made such a speech an explosion of his hair-trigger temper would have followed. But Lillian is a privileged person—Dicky owes her too much to question seriously any reasure of hers. But I knew that she had "drawn blood" in her mocking little speech, even though Dicky gave a forced laugh and answered her with a creditable assumption of carelessness.

"If you'll kindly explain to me the reason for all this palaver I'll be very grateful," he drawled. "Asking me what I think of your scheme, first, when it's all cut and dried till it's like jerked beef! It's like a hold-up getting putting a revolver to your head and saying, 'Your money or your life.' Will you be kind enough to make a choice, and what do you think of my offer?" I'm on, of course, there is nothing else I can do apparently, but I can see myself camping in the studio a good share of the time this summer.

His voice held a distinct note of self-pity, and I saw that he was indulging himself in what Lillian has dubbed his "martred mood." She shot a furtive amused glance at him.

"You win, Lill!"

"And a very comfortable camping place it is," Lillian retorted. "You needn't lug any fagots and boiling oil around with you on that account."

I saw a reluctant grin twitch the corners of Dicky's mouth, and knew that his good nature and his admiration for Lillian would banish his irritation.

"You win, Lill!" he said, patting her shoulder affectionately. "I know I'm an awful grouch, but I am sort of flabbergasted over the situation."

"I know," Lillian returned with instant comprehension. "We all are. But we're lucky that we happen to be situated so it will only be the minimum of discomfort for us. I understand that any number of families are being driven beyond the commuting zone. That means week-ends only for the fathers, while you and I, Dicky, need only to run up to the city occasionally. I'm mighty glad now I kept my studio through all this. I haven't been in the place a half-dozen times since Harry went to South America, but I'll fit it up a little more adequately, and have a regular light house-keeping apartment whenever I come to the city. And my own apartment sub-let will be bringing in a nice little sum."

Dicky glanced at her quickly, and I fancied I saw upon his face an expression that was not disappointment or apprehension, but which smacked of both. The next instant, however, it had been replaced by a mocking grin.

"Listen to Shylock chinking his coins," he gibed. "Well, Madge, I suppose we might as well be driving along home. If you're going to look up places out on the island, you'll probably be starting tomorrow."

Left Out

"The day after," Lillian responded quickly, "that is for me. I shall have to go into the city tomorrow to put things in shape for a week's absence. You see, Madge and I will have to stay out there until we do find something. Thanks to your wife's management, and the faithfulness of Jim and Katie, everything is about ready to set on the vans. Madge won't have to come back to the house at all after she leaves day after tomorrow if she doesn't wish to. You can take a few necessary things with you to the studio, and the rest can come out on the van."

"Sounds dreary," Dicky commented with a little shrug, and I schooled his lament in my own heart, even while I wondered at Lillian's sudden decision to spend the next day in the city.

It was the first I had heard of it, and I could not help wondering if it had anything to do with her investigation into the mischief wrought by the mysterious marauders in our home. She had rigidly avoided any allusion to the subject, to all appearances had put it out of her mind during our hunt for a house, but I knew her mental processes well enough to be certain that it was far from being either forgotten or neglected.

I speeded up the car with a feeling of vague irritation at both Dicky and Lillian, a feeling of being left out of their plans. That the feeling was a totally unreasonable one as far as Lillian was concerned I knew, and I was also conscious that the origin of my annoyance at my husband was silly to say the least. But I could not rid myself of the recollection of the queer look which had crossed Dicky's face when Lillian had spoken of changing her studio into a "light housekeeping apartment."

He had been annoyed at the prospect of her presence in the same building which held his own studio. Why?
