True Blue Traveler Is in Salem for Short Time After Thousands of Miles

A fleet of "True Blue Travelers"—of which the brand new Oaklands for 1924 are exact counterparts—is engaged in a remarkable tour.

From Pontiac these new and True Blue cars are being driven over various routes extending to the farthest points of the country.

These cars are the "advance guard" of a new motor car that has been building for more than two years—a motor car that represents all of Oakland's wide experience in exclusive light six manufacture, reinforced with the limitless resources of the great General Motors Corporation.

The purpose of these transcontinental tours is to demonstrate to motor car buyers everywhere, not only the high quality of Oakland construction, but, more important still, the remarkably efficient service buyers may expect from this new Oakland model, even after months of the hardest service.

One of these True Blue travelers is scheduled to arrive at Vick Bros. sales rooms at 11:30 today, and will remain in Salem for about two hours. This car has been driven many thousands of miles, over all kinds of roads, and it will be interesting to see how well they are standing this demonstrating road test.

In this land of the tree you can do about as you please if you don't worry or antagonize the majority.

When a motion picture director is able to weave a baseball sequence into a production that carries a thrill to one of the greatest stars the game has known, he has achieved a high standard of perfection. There is no criticism in the world equal to that of a man who himself has lived in reality the thing he sees enacted on the screen.

Yet this was accomplished by Harry Pollard in his direction of "Trifling With Honor," the Universal-Jewel photodrama which is now being shown at the Liberty theater. When Mike Donlin, one of the greatest hitters that ever lifted a bat, walked out of one of the projection rooms at Universal City, where he had seen a pre-view of the picture, blinked at the sun and said: "That's great. There's a thrill in it even for an old has-been like me."

Donlin has quit professional baseball, but the followers of the game will recall that back in the days between 1905 and 1909 he was one of the sensations of the major leagues. For years he was the crack outfielder of John McGraw's New York Giants, and his batting average always topped the 300-mark, which in those days was not only exceptional, but rare.

Donlin wrote a personal letter to Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal Pictures Corporation, enthusiastically praising the baseball sequences and commending highly the picture as a whole.

Rockliffe Fellowes, one of the best known actors in the screen world, plays the part of the baseball hero in this production. It is interesting to note that Fellowes was one of the famous college baseball stars of the country during his undergraduate days. Playing opposite Fellowes is Fritz Ridgeway, one of the most talented actresses on the screen. She is an artist that never sacrifices realism just for the sake of looking pretty, as do so many of the temperamental cinema stars.

The story was originally written for the Collier's Weekly and made a tremendous impression when first published.

For three weeks D. W. Griffith filmed strikingly quaint pastoral scenes along the Bayou Teche, in western Louisiana, for his newest picture, "The White Rose," a United Artists release coming tonight to the Oregon theater, and then went to Miami, Fla., where he finished the picture. Mr. Griffith had with him Mae Marsh, Carol Dempster, Ivor Novello, Neil Hamilton, Lucille La Verne, Porter Strong and other players.

"The White Rose" is a typical story of the old South, and it was with no little difficulty that the producer was able to find scenes suited to it. The South has been fairly well consumed in the march of progress and for a time it looked as if the foremost director would not secure the pastoral backgrounds he sought. The love of the people of the Teche country to preserve and maintain old traditions in life and architecture was of great benefit to Mr. Griffith who found in western Louisiana the sort of settings he was in need of. There are to be found homes which have stood unmolested by the touch of modernism for 100 years. In many of the hamlets and towns along the Bayou Teche and where Mr. Griffith covered a range of 80 miles, only French is heard. Little English is spoken in many of these places.

The descendants of the old Acadians who settled in the Teche country when driven out of Nova Scotia by the British in 1755, are keen about continuing in the ways of their forefathers and they gained added inspiration when Longfellow immortalized the Teche land by having Evangeline and Gabriel pass unseen along that stream. In St. Martinville the people, who are distinctly French, now keep in reverence an old oak, festooned with Spanish moss and covered by Camelia blossoms as a relic of the heroine of Longfellow's poem. They even declare that the girl slept beneath this very tree when her lover passed by in the night. Out of respect to them, Mr. Griffith filmed several episodes with the oak in the background.

What is history? One philosopher defined it as "the unfolding of human actions in the light of newer wisdom and experiences."

History is the background and keynote of "The Oregon Trail," a Universal chapter play starring Art Acord, which will show at the Bligh theatre in 15 chapters beginning with the first one today.

History presents stranger stories than novels or magazines, which is but another angle of the old saying: "Truth is stranger than fiction." Romance is the very breath of life in many of the most vivid chapters of history.

The opening of the great Northwest, through the explorations of the Oregon Trail captained by Lewis and Clark, forms one of the really thrilling episodes in the history of the United States. America was young then and few dreamed that the new territory opened through the daring of the explorers along the Oregon Trail would some day be worth billions of dollars to the world and particularly to the American flag.

BITS FOR BREAKFAST

Harvesting your walnuts? Five things to have on your curb or in your back yard the trees that throw into your lap the kings of the nuts.

It is getting so that when outsiders refer to Salem as the nut city, they do not necessarily refer to the large family out at the end of Center street, under the care of Dr. Steiner. Salem is growing to be a great walnut orchard, surrounded by still greater walnut orchards.

Put one thing down as certain. There is going to be no departure at the Oregon penitentiary from the program to make the institution self supporting. The line is plainly marked out, and it is going to be followed, day by day. The first thing is to get a roof over the big brick warehouse, at the earliest possible time, and the next thing is to get the flax machinery at work turning out the marketable products for which orders are piling up. Then all the other things in that line will follow in their order.

Former Vice President Marshall says that he remembers the time when a book was considered a luxury. Now he has lived to see the day when a book rarely escapes being a nuisance.
