CHAPTER 56

THE SURPRISING FACTS FRED TOLD MADGE

The Cosgrove twins are as alike in faces, voices, height, weight—all physical characteristics—as the proverbial two peas in a pod. But there the resemblance ends. Temperamentally they are leagues apart.

Ted is a harum-scarum, volatile youth, who, if he were a student at a co-educational institution, he would be dubbed a "fusser" from his first day on the campus. Fred, on the contrary, is shy, silent, devoted to his mother, and with apparently little use for any other specimens of femininity, no matter how attractive. Ted chatters all day long, and no one pays any attention to him. Fred speaks but rarely, and when he does he has attentive listeners.

I was much surprised at this embarrassed announcement; that there was something he ought to tell me concerning the fight between Dicky and the man Smith, but I knew that it behooved me to listen carefully and to draw from him every shred of knowledge he possessed on the subject. "Yes, Fred, what is it?" I asked encouragingly, as he paused, looking at me as if for permission to go on.

He glanced around furtively, saw that Bess Dean was standing with his father out of earshot, and then burst into impulsive explication. "Say, that Bess Dean makes me sick!" He spluttered like a Fourth of July pin-wheel.

I started with a quick, remorseful pre-sence of the truth. "What?" I demanded sharply. "Because she's such a four-flusher." He pronounced this most drastic judgment of boyhood emphatically, and paused again, while I longed to shake his reasons out of him.

"What Did He Do?" "Tell me what you mean, Fred." I encouraged. "You must have some good reason for saying these things." "I'll tell the world I have!" he declared excitedly. "If she ain't the limit (telling you that Mr. Graham slammed that Smith because Smith got fresh to her, I was standin' right by, and saw the whole thing, and Smith never said one word to Miss Dean. I don't think he had time to look at anybody, for just as soon as your car was out of sight Mr. Graham walks up to Smith, kind of on his toes like, he looked almost as if he was dancing, and he—oh, boy, but it was pretty!"

He paused again maddeningly, and I bit my lips to keep from screaming my impatience at him. But I dared only to slip in a quiet question. "What did he do?" "He bows so polite as if he were being introduced, and says: 'Mr. Smith, I believe.'"

"Smith, he looks at him ugly-like, and tries to push past him. I guess he was in a powerful hurry to get away, and he growls out something like: 'Yes, what's it to you?'"

"It's this to me," says Mr. Graham. "You double-jointed, knock-kneed, foul-mouthed son of a sea-cook, you took it on yourself to make it very unpleasant for my wife just now, and I waited till she was out of sight and hearing to give you yours. Will you take it standing, or shall I turn you over my knee?"
