CHAPTER NO. 86

THE QUESTION ROBERT SAVARIN ASKED MADGE

"Lillian tells me you're all going tomorrow. I'm sorry."

"There was conventional regret in Mrs. Cosgrove's voice, but I suspected that in her heart there was relief, even gladness—unconscious, no doubt, but distinct. She had made up her mind that her brother would be happier for awhile without Lillian, and I knew that for him she would have ruthlessly banished from her home everyone except her husband and children, no matter how dear the tie of friendship or association."

"I'm sorry, too," I said prevaricating in my turn. "But there are several very necessary things calling me home, and Dicky is getting very restless—eager to get at his work again. And now what about lunch? We shall have to break the journey tomorrow night at some hotel, but I don't want to take Junior into a public restaurant for lunch, and I need enough milk in the thermos bottles to do him until we get home."

"No, there's too many chances of his catching something," Mrs. Cosgrove agreed. "Of course you can have a lunch, and all the milk you want. Just bring over your motor kit tonight, and I'll plan to get up extra early tomorrow morning, so as to have the things fresh. Lillian says you're going to start at 7. You'll want your breakfast about quarter-past six, won't you?"

"Yes, I think so," I returned deprecatingly. "I am afraid we are making you a great deal of bother."

Madge explains.

"Bother's my middle name," she retorted. "But you're not making it. I always rise very early anyway, to get a lot of work out of the way before breakfast, and tomorrow I haven't anything on hand that can't be let go. It's the end of the season, and all of my people will be gone by another week. I do hope it will be a nice day for your trip home."

"Whose trip home?" Robert Savarin's voice, hoarse, agitated, sounded in the kitchen door behind me. "Madge, you don't mean—"

"But I do, Robert," I said quietly, realizing that I must convince him that the decision to go home so unexpectedly came from us, not Lillian. "Dicky has been urging me to go home for several days, and today he insisted that we must start tomorrow morning. I have been almost at my wits' end getting the packing done, but I get the last thing finished, so if it doesn't rain the traditional pitchforks, we'll start at seven o'clock."

"Lillian is not going with you." The words were a defiant assertion and a terrified question. With a sudden resolution I raised my eyes to telegraph a request to Mrs. Cosgrove. Her supper was on the stove, her paying guests gathering, but she only waited the seconds necessary to slide a pan of deliciously frying potatoes to the back of the stove, and open her oven door a trifle, before slipping quietly out of the kitchen.

I put my hand on Robert Savarin's arm, looked up into the brown eyes heavy with anguish, and tried not to recall the fact that before I had seen him almost miraculously restored to sanity, those eyes had held only the glitter of madness.

"Did she—"

"Robert," I said soberly, almost solemnly. "Have been your friend, your advocate, through these trying years, have I not?"

He started, and I saw a little of the absorbed self-centredness slip away from him.

"Yes, you have been more than kind."

"And I think you realize—it is not bragado to speak the truth either—that I know Lillian better than any other woman does, and that I am closer to her than anyone save Marion and you."

"I think you know her even better than I do," he said with a note of bitterness.

I protested with an emphatic "No, indeed!" though I felt in my heart that he had uttered the truth—and hurried on a bit breathlessly.

"I must tell you, though, that you are risking much if you oppose Lillian's going home at this juncture. She is much over-wrought, and she needs to be—well, frankly, Robert, I think she needs absence from you for a short time, a chance to get over the shock of your having taken the attitude you did toward—"

He threw back his head and his eyes flamed with anger.

"Did she—?" he began stormily.

"She told me nothing," I interrupted sternly, "as you very well know, if you give yourself a chance to think of her. You told me yourself all that I needed to know when Col. Travers came to see her. And—I have eyes."

President Hickman Goes On Trip for Kimball

Dr. E. C. Hickman, president of Kimball School of Theology, left Friday evening for an extended visitation in Montana addressing churches, high schools, colleges and civic clubs in the interests of Kimball school.

He will occupy the pulpit of the First Methodist church at Missoula on Sunday next; address the Rotary club at Warm Springs Monday noon, and lecture through the week at Anaconda, Butte, Bozeman and Billings. February 3 to 10 he will be in a series of evangelistic meetings at Glendive, Mont., where he will be joined by his father from Dakota who will conduct the singing. Father and son have engaged in many previous evangelistic campaigns together.

Returning, he will visit Helena, Great Falls and intervening points including engagements in Spokane, to return to Salem February 20.

Dr. Hickman has recently represented Kimball in Grants Pass, Medford and Ashland, and in Tacoma and Seattle. He reports that everywhere there is a deepening interest in the development and the program of Kimball School of Theology and in the recruiting and training of ministers. Upon the completion of his present itinerary, he will have delivered 50 lectures and addresses during the months of January and February.

January 27 is designated as Kimball Sunday in the Methodist churches throughout Oregon and Washington when the interests of Kimball School of Theology will be presented and an offering taken. Salem churches will observe this Sunday on the 27th of April.

Chemawa Players Win Game With Deaf School

The Deaf school five suffered another defeat in a hotly contested basketball game at the hands of Chemawa Friday night on the school floor. The score was 27 to 13. The Chemawa boys outclassed the local quintet in every department of the game. So closely guarded were the latter that they could hardly find loopholes to shoot the ball through. The game was hotly fought from start to finish and furnished plenty of thrills to the spectators.

Hallen and Day, at the Bligh today. Mr. Hallen has been featured comedian with "Dancing Around," and is an asset to vaudeville. Miss Day has been in pictures, being two years with the Lasky studios and with the combined experiences and their ability they present what can truthfully be called a treat to vaudeville.

COREY IS AGAIN PSC CANDIDATE

Chairman Is Aspirant to Succeed Himself—Represents East Side

H. H. Corey, chairman of the public service commission, yesterday announced his candidacy to succeed himself. He will ask for the Republican nomination at the primary election in May, to represent the eastern division of the state on the commission.

"I wish to submit my candidacy for nomination for another term as public service commissioner for eastern Oregon district, believing that I am now better qualified than ever to fulfill the exacting requirements of public utility regulation," says Mr. Corey's statement. "In this, as in all other business, other things being equal, continuity of personnel is one of the most important factors of success; for commissioners, at least, are presumed to be informed by experience."

"I was formerly secretary of the commission, and since my first year as commissioner, no order signed by me has been reversed by the courts or annulled by the interstate commerce commission."

"Appreciating the fact that I am a servant of the people, I have been mindful of my oath of office. However, the tendency to do the popular thing sometimes is very strong, and it often requires more courage to do one's duty according to the facts of the case, than to do the popular thing; for it is human to desire public approval of one's decisions. Needless to say, it has always been my desire to do justice to the public, the utilities and the railroads."

"Without idle promise or empty pledge, I stand squarely upon my record in public office, and will be very grateful if the people in my district should elect to retain me for another term."

Moore Invites Marshals Of United States Here

Will H. Moore, state fire marshal and state insurance commissioner, has invited the Fire Marshals' Association of North America to hold its 1924 national convention in Portland. The invitation was sent to C. L. Topping at Charlestown, W. Va., fire marshal of that state and president of the national association. The insurance commissioners of the United States will meet in Seattle this year and usually the two conventions are held at about the same time.
