FOR A MEMORIAL AND A PAGEANT

At Hemet, California, near the edge of the desert, thirty miles southeast of San Bernardino, there was recently held the Pageant of Ramona-

Given in a bowl of the hills, a natural ampitheater where the voices of the players could be heard as easily as in any temple builded by the hand of man. There in the green bowl of the shining hills the people of Hemet enacted the beautiful our money to heart appeals, and story of Ramona. Not far away were many of the actual spots of all the places we can pledge in which Helen Hunt had laid the scenes of her great story.

It was something like the setting for the play, "The Bridge of the Gods," given at Astoria in 1905.

walk therein, we have all and lack nothing.

California makes the most of her opportunities in this field. The Mission Play at San Gabriel, nine miles out of Los Angeles, is a case in point. The wide world is now pouring a stream of checks into the hands of John Steven McGroarty, the author of that play and the founder of the pageant and the presentation of it, in order that magnificent buildings, already started for the splendid housing of it, may be brought in the fullness of time to completion.

In many ways, California capitalizes her opportunities to draw world attention to her historic places; makes memorials and puts on plays and pageants and appeals in other ways to local sentiment and pride and patriotism, and by the same sign of Salem has a right to aspire to makes her name known in every nook and corner of the whole

We have here the institution of higher learning that was the first of its kind to be opened in the "Oregon Country," Willamette university.

Here is a setting, here are themes, for an annual pageant and a memorial that would draw the attention of the world to Salem; that would bring pilgrimages for all time from near and

Taking the mere money value, which ought to be the last value to be considered, our people are neglecting a great opportunity. They could afford to assess themselves a large annual sum to bring about this Oberammergau vision of the Oregon to anything in the public service

But that is not the way such things are brought to frutition One obscure newspaper writer, John Steven McGroarty, had the vision for the California Mission Play, at San Gabriel. He put the vision into words, transformed the words into action, and the entire earth has taken note and is hastening to make the dream come true, in a finer and greater form than was in the mind of the humble dreamer in his first glimpses of his vision.

Wanted, in Salem, a John Steven McGroarty. And he does need to be a man of means. But he must have a vision, and old to the vision; hold high the picture of what may be done. And he must persist. He may be a worker, as McGroarty is ill a worker, at a weekly wage, on the Los Angeles Times. but he must hold to his vision.

Our McGroarty may be a woman. We have many women iere who would be capable.

But our McGroarty must be unselfish-absolutely; as the founder of the California Mission Play is unselfish. He asks nothing for himself; but he asks everything for his state.

Where is our McGroarty? He probably will be one of our usiest workers. Luther Burbank spends more hours with his nose to the grindstone, in contact with the fruitful soil, than any farmer in Oregon-outside of Labish Meadows. Still, in e watches of the night, he finds time to write books and articles that would fill other books, telling the world of his discoveries, for the world's good.

Are you hard worked? Is your toil grinding? Then perips you are the one to take up the long fight to make Salem he Oberammergau of the Oregon Country.
