CHAPTER 230

WHY MADGE HESITATED TO AID ALLEN DRAKE

I am sure I know now the feelings of the legendary mouse when she realized that it depended upon her to free the lordly lion from his bonds. My father's hesitating request that I would send word to Allen Drake of my willingness to help him with the refractory code, frightened me as much as it astonished me.

True, I remembered well—too well, I thought sometimes—when the brilliant secret service agent had been kind of my help. But that was only in the service given him by my unusual memory. This freakish gift of mine which I have untiringly cultivated, had upon one particular occasion enabled me to carry in my mind whole lists of names and figures which it was unsafe for him to carry with him upon paper. It had been several years since I had memorized those lists for Allen Drake, I had not thought of them for months, at least, but yet I knew that I could repeat unerringly every one of them if he should ask me for them.

But that I could possibly help Allen Drake in deciphering a code—Allen Drake, the acknowledged master of two continents in his peculiar gifts—I found myself trembling at the very thought! And yet I never had known my father to act upon impulse, or without some sure knowledge back of his words or actions. I could not help protesting, however, and I felt the blood rush to my face as I spoke.

"Of course, I am willing to do anything you ask me, Father," I said earnestly. "But how in the world could I help Allen Drake with a code?"

"I am not sure that you can," he returned with a little smile. "But there is something about the thing baffling him which is connected in some intangible way with you. I cannot explain it—and I may be altogether wrong—but I have the feeling that if you see the paper on which Allen is working you may be able to give him some aid."

"But—" my voice held all the incredulity I felt, "has Mr. Drake asked that I help him?"

"I Cannot Volunteer—"

My father's face and voice were unruffled as he gave me the answer which threw me into a panic.

"No, he doesn't dream, of course, that you could. But if I can carry him the word that you are willing, I am sure you will take a great burden from his mind."

Before my face flashed a swift vision of Allen Drake's face should my father give him such a message from me. I could imagine the lazy, scornful amusement with which he would greet such a message, and the vision urged my lips to a firm denial.

"I cannot volunteer any help to Mr. Drake on a subject of which I know nothing," I said. "But if—"

My father interrupted me smiling.

"I will guarantee that he does not think you presumptuous and there will be no volunteering about it. I will confide to him my reason, or rather my impression—for it is only a hazy feeling—that you may be able to help him. I will assure him of your willingness, and of your doubt, and will then send for you. How will that do?"

I met his kindly, quizzical eyes bravely.

"That will do admirably," I said, "And I will do the very best I can, but—"

"Suppose we stop right here," he said, drawing me to him and kissing me tenderly. "Please remain here, if possible, alone, for fifteen minutes."

"That is easily arranged," I answered. "Marion and Junior are asleep, Lillian is at work in her room, Mother Graham is reading in hers, and Katie left the kitchen for her quarters before I came upstairs."

"Excellent," he said commendingly. "I am sure I shall be back in fifteen minutes."

A Long-Cherished Dream.

He opened the door and went out, but I was scarcely conscious of his going, for to me was coming the first faint hope of a long-cherished dream, coming true—a dream scarcely acknowledged even to myself.

I cannot remember when puzzles of any kind, even the simple puzzles on the children's page of a newspaper, have not had an almost uncanny fascination for me. I have spent hours in their solving when I was ashamed to let any one know how I was spending my time. And any piece of fiction which deals with the deciphering of a code has always held me spellbound—I have worn my copy of Poe's "The Gold Bug," threadbare—but I have tried to keep my obsession a secret, fearing lest Dicky, for instance, with his love of ridicule, should discover it.

And now, within a few minutes, I should have the chance to work upon a code with Allen Drake, whose masterly ability in his chosen work was, I knew, one secret of the fascination his personality always has held for me.

WIND SWEEPS FIRE

RENO, Nev., July 30.—Wind today swept the forest fire on the ridge east of Floriston county, four miles away from the town, and the most serious blaze is now burning up and down the Truckee river, on the west side of the canyon. The Truckee River Power company's plant, two miles from Floriston, is being guarded by a special crew of men and at one point the flames are within a half mile of the plant.
