Exendine Predicts That California Will Be Easier to Beat this Year

SPOKANE, Sept. 10.—Washington and Stanford are teams to be reckoned with in Pacific coast conference football this fall, in the opinion of Coach A. A. Exendine of Washington State college, he declared here today.

fact that Coach Bagshaw at Washington will have a formidable lineup of material and that "Pop" Warner's coaching ability will enable Stanford to make a strong showing with the promising candidates available there.

"On press-season dope I can't see that the conference is going to have any weak teams," he was quoted as saying. "Naturally, California will be strong again—mighty strong—with the kind of team that will be desperately hard to lick."

However, he declared he believed, conference conditions indicate better chance of beating California any year since 1919. With only one away from home game on the Washington schedule, Coach Exendine expressed the conviction that the Huskies have a great chance to land at the top of the heap.

As to the chances of Washington State, he said: "We have hopes, we are making no big predictions."

brought by the commission upon its own motion; therefore there were but two formal parties involved, the commission and the carriers. To be sure, some shippers upon request testified for the commission; so did other shippers testify for the railroads and oppose the relief sought to be made effective by the commission's complaint. These witnesses were not parties to the case. Manifestly, had all shippers been called into the conference, it would have resulted in nothing more or less than another hearing in the matter. Mr. McCoy's inference that there were "star chamber proceedings" is merely political chicanery.

HOPE HELD THAT YOUNG QUINLAND MAY BE ALIVE

and travel that might have appealed to an imaginative 14-year-old? Is being asked.

Residents of West Salem watched the proceedings at the river. It was stated by at least one of these that a boy on a bicycle, answering the general description of Eldon Quinland, was seen Monday afternoon, the time the drowning is supposed to have occurred. The boy is said to have carried a bundle under his arm.

If Quinland obtained the clothing for himself and Sherman, where he got this is not known, for Mr. Quinland made a careful check of his son's wearing apparel and announced that there was nothing missing. Some money belonging to the boy was also found in his locker. This is the only thing in a chain of problematical circumstances that might not fit into the general scheme of conjecture.

In the meantime the search along the bottom of the Willamette is being continued and will be in progress until every possible doubt that the body of Eldon Quinland is not in the vicinity of the swimming hole. The search is not being carried on only close to the place where it is thought possible for the boy to have drowned, but for several hundred feet along the bank and out to the main current of the river.

PACIFIST PASTORS SOUNDLY FLAYED

General White outlined the purpose of the National Defense act, which became a law in June 1920. The law, he said, provided for the security of the nation in time of an emergency that might arise in the future. The bulk of the test falls upon the citizens of the country, he said, and three classifications are to be represented. First the regular army, with 120,000 officers and enlisted men; second, the national guard, with 200,000 officers and men and finally the organized defense of a skeletonized army consisting chiefly of reserve officers, the men to be recruited as the occasion demands. It is to learn how quickly the citizen army can be mobilized that the test is being made. When volunteer enlistments prove too slow, the country resorts to a draft.

In refuting arguments against the mobilization, on the ground that it is militaristic and tends to stimulate the war, General White emphasized the fact that like boats are used at frequent intervals on the ocean and not ignored until a vessel sinks and that fire departments do not incite incendiarism. In closing General White predicted that Oregon would "go over the top" in its quota of volunteer enlistments for Friday.

Following General White, Col. Carl Abrams, passed rolls among members of the club for signatories of approval to the plan, and explained its purpose briefly. He announced that after the parade has been formed, heads would be uncovered for two minutes in memory of those who gave their lives for their country and that taps would be sounded by a muted bugle.
