EPISODE C. THE FRANTIC FLIGHT HERE

THE UMBRELLA MENDER

As a rule the stranger stooped to look at old Mackinson, umbrella mender, for he was a man of strange contrasts, a figure out of the old paintings of patriarchs. Mackinson's hair and beard were white and his eyes a guilless blue. His tattered and even disreputable clothes would have given him an evil appearance were it not for the noble carriage of head and childlike gaze. Mackinson mended umbrellas and, when he had the time, sketched upon scraps of paper with a stub of a pencil. He was quite certain that he was a great artist. Those who stopped to look over his shoulder when he was drawing smiled to see such scribbles as might have been made by a child

"I never had the chance to take lessons," the old man would say, "and never had the time to develop my talent. But now, with this umbrella business to keep me going, I am getting my hand in." Then he would concentrate heavily while the pencil added to the effects of his picture and say. 'Do you know, I wouldn't be surprised if I found a market for this."

Mackinson's stand was in a side street and across from the office of a wholesale concern. He had drawn every building in sight and so welcomed any new subject that came within his range. One afternoon his pencil was busy with a large automobile which had stopped near the wholesale house. It was built for speed and luxury, and the old man forgot the umbrella business, his need for money, and the people who passed as he made a picture which, to him, was his masterpiece. He had all but finished when two men ran out of the office, leaped into the machine and drove off. "Just my luck!" complained the artist, "now I have to finish it clanged up, a crowd collected and thele were policemen everywhere. To Hackinson it was bewilde Instead of being curious he was frightened, like a child lost in a crowd on the street.

But there was not time to finish. Things began to happen in that was amazing. A patrol wage by memory."

A police captain paused in front of the umbrella man, looked in a book, then made a motion, "You will come with me," 1 sald kindly. "We are going to take care of you, see that you get a comfortable place to live. This was the law. He could trust the law. "But my business

"After a while. When it gets warmer again." Mackinson was not to know that men thought him incapable of caring for himself, that the scrawl he called pictures and his destitute appearance had been reapon sible for reports which brought him to the station.

"I guess," said the captain,

"they'll have to call him a vagabond and send him over for a while. Maybe there is some institution." "When the weather gets warmer," said Mackinson in his cell, and he drew his paper from under his arm and started drawing. When they came to get him, that he might go before the judge, he was drawing an interior of the cell, but it was not this picture that drew the attention of the captain who, following the case with sympathy, had come for the "When," he said, pointing to drawing that had fallen on the floor, "did you make that?" "I was doing it when all those policemen came and ran around and got me for doing nothing at "And that automobile, was it the one which went away just before we came?" Mackinson smiled. The captali had recognized it was an automobile he had drawn. "The very one, just as it was there, only it went away before I could put the finishing touches "Listen!" the captain was intensely interested, "that number there, are you sure it is the same as the one on the machine?" "I am a real artist," said old man Mackinson, "and I never make mistakes." It is a fact they caught the men who robbed the wholesale house from the odd drawing made by the umbrella mender. And Mackinson's reward was release in fail, release with a sum of mone paid him by a man in a high hat "He isn't a vag now; he's got money," said the captain, "and I guess, anyway he isn't doing anybody any harm."
