STIMULATING TALK ON INTERIORS

Home Beautiful Week Offers Opportunity for Learning How

Most women are experts in selecting their clothes. They know what clothes are best suited to bring out their particular style of beauty. They know, too, whether the tighter effect of the Empire costume is more becoming to them than the loose clothing of other periods.

American women are most sensitive, too, to the lines of their clothing. One side of their skirt up—the other side down does not please them. How can it be then, that the best dressed of all women—the American women—can so shockingly disregard the simplest rules of decorating their homes—for truly, from the viewpoint of an expert, American home interiors are most inartistic.

Women should study the color scheme of their rooms in much the same manner as they study the colors of their gowns. It is passe to wear white shirt waists and dark skirts. It isn't fashionable, and the vogue will never revert to that combination. The reason is simple: It is bad art to mix colors which contrast so greatly when used in large areas.

Predominating Color
It is the same way with one's rooms, apartment or home. Now-days those well posted on interior decoration do not have the rug one color—the woodwork another and the ceiling a stupid white. What cultivated people strive for is harmony in color—they demand that there be a keynote tone in the room. To illustrate this better assume that the room to be decorated is, for five or six hours of the day, flooded with brilliant sunlight. It would be good art then to use a cool color as the room keynote. Let us assume that green is the color decided upon, so, in selecting drapery, wall paper, paint and rugs each should contain shades of green, varying in intensity from the floor right up to the ceiling. In other words, the rugs should have worked into their design, here and there, a touch of dark green. The woodwork should be tinted with a slightly lighter shade of green—the wall paper a still lighter shade, and the ceiling carrying the lightest tint of all.

Upon entering a room so colored we find it most pleasing to the eye, and harmony is produced which could not be obtained if different and contrasting colors had been used.

The idea of harmony of color can be carried even to the furniture itself. Now-a-days it is possible to purchase furniture ready to be painted—we can mix our own colors—experiment with them—and do our own painting if we have the leisure.

The "Restful" Room
In order to create restfulness in a room, however, it is not necessary to have the furniture in tone with the keynote color of the room. Walnuts, mahogany or any of the popular woods work well in practically all color schemes, though in very small rooms it is inadvisable to use much red furniture, because red leaps out to meet you, while other colors do not impose themselves so forcibly. If we wish to make a large room appear small we use reds very freely all throughout the room—it we wish to create the idea of great space, yellow and green are the ideal colors.

Starting as we have to create a restful home we should give great attention to the arrangement of all furniture. It is not only unrestful, but extremely bad taste, to have our furniture placed in any other way except flat against the wall. Pieces set in the cater-cornered fashion are confusing to the eye—they create an unrest in us for which doctors find it hard to account. In a celebrated church in New York, a still more celebrated minister found that he could not, for the first time in his life, hold the attention of his congregation. After months of thought, he finally called in an expert on interior decoration. The expert had already solved the problem when he entered the church. He found conflicting lines in the arrangement of the pews and in the arrangement of the other furniture, and he found the color scheme contrary to all laws which would produce a peaceful state of mind. Within two weeks that church had been redecorated—the furniture had been rearranged and for the first time in months our celebrated clergyman was able to hold the undivided interest of his congregation.

Right Angles, Only, Correct
Every line in a room, no matter whether of furniture, pictures, picture wires, drapery or lighting apparatus, should follow the lines of the room. In other words, anything but right angles is bad art. Harmony can only be produced where lines are straight. Apply that principle to hanging your pictures—don't use one nail or one hook and loop your wire over it—use two nails or two hooks, keeping the wires of the picture parallel. Do not let your pictures hang at an angle from the wall—place them flat against the wall—keep either the tops of the pictures or the bottoms an equal distance from the floor. Hang them low—the center of a picture should never be above five feet seven inches from the floor. Do not have the sofa placed at an angle of 45 degrees with the wall
