Downing Remains Same—County Judge W. H. Downing, who has been confined to the Sa-

she turned my bruised and grimed face up to hers. "Sit still and close your eyes until I come back. I won't be five minutes."

She lowered her own record—promise in her return, laden with a basin of warm water, soap, an antiseptic lotion, a healing unguent, and plenty of soft clothes.

"Now," she said, tucking a big bath towel around my neck, "we'll have you looking like the cricket's chirp in no time. But I warn you, some of this will smart."

Her warning was justified. Some of her remedies did smart almost intolerably, but though I am an arrant coward where physical pain is concerned, I set my teeth, determined not to wince, when only a few feet from my door.

Tom Chester had undergone—indeed, was undergoing still—agonies which made my hurts seem the meekest annoyances.

But it was over at last, and with my face feeling comfortable and my nervous tension relaxed, I opened my eyes when Lillian gave me permission, and smiled at her.

"I feel like a new woman," I said gratefully.

Lillian tipped her head to one side, looking at me critically.

Plans in Detail—"You look like one, that is, like the militant variety used to look after having been dragged from a heckling stunt."

He remarked dryly, "No," as I rose involuntarily, "you can't have any mirror. Your face will be healed over in a few days, and there's no use upsetting your vanity before then. I've something more important on hand. Tell me everything that happened since you left the house. Of course, I know you did the job, somehow, but I'd like the details."

The note of pride, of absolute confidence in her voice was most gratifying, but when I had finished recounting the incidents of my expedition, including Tom Chester's disablement, and my own wild ride upon the back of Smith's limousine, the loving, impetuous clasp of her arms, and her lavish commendation so rarely bestowed, thrilled me greatly and made me flush deeply.

"You brave, resourceful, idiotic girl!" she exclaimed, with her arms close around me. "How easily you might have been killed!"

But how wonderful to think you turned the trick! That look in the chair is flashed now. Somer or later Smith will lead the way to the man we want, the wealthy, trusted, seemingly 100 per cent American, who is the spider in the center of this monstrous web of treachery and infamy.

"Turn Up the Light!" "I wish she weren't going," I said impetuously. "I feel as though—"

"You feel as though you needed a good night's sleep to get the tremors out of you," Lillian retorted. "Of course you are losing everything in the calendar that could happen to Katherine just now, and I don't wonder after your experience this evening."

Katherine won't be in any danger—ended or angry. Lillian's footsteps sounded behind me, and she had caught up to me by the time I had managed to open Katie's door.

My little maid was sitting up in bed, her hands clutching at her still swollen throat upon which Smith's brutal, murderous hands had closed, her eyes wildly darting around the dimly-lighted room.

her lips uttering hoarse cries, which were increasing in volume with every second. I sprang to the side of the bed, throwing a crisp command over my shoulder to Lillian:

"I listened for a second or two, then rose abruptly.

"It's Katie," I decided. "I was afraid she'd be frightened when she awakened. Harry, or she'll rouse everybody in the house."

I was in the hall before I had finished speaking, and racing down the corridor to the kitchen wing, Katie's cries—mere wimpers at first—were becoming louder, and I knew my volatile little maid's tendency to hysteria when frightened or angry.

Lillian's feet were still on the stairs when I had caught up to me by the time I had managed to open Katie's door.
