SOCIETY

Miss Melton, head of the piano department at Willamette University, in appearing Friday, will greet Salem musical lovers in her first formal concert work since coming to the campus. Miss Nellie Schwab and Leslie Springer are both local artists, winning invariable favor with their audiences.

Forty-two members of the Miller Mercantile company staff were guests at 6 o'clock Wednesday evening at a banquet at the Gray Belle. A brief business session was conducted, and later in the club rooms at the store an entertainment was held, arranged by the store's dramatic club.

Two charming house-guests in Salem, Mrs. S. G. Sargent of San Francisco and Mrs. F. M. Jordan of Seattle, were honored at a 1 o'clock luncheon on Friday when Mrs. T. A. Livesley entertained for their pleasure at the Livesley home on Lincoln hill.

Mr. and Mrs. Roy V. Ohmart of Liberty entertained recently with a family dinner in honor of the birthday of Mrs. Adam Oumart. Mrs. W. C. Kinney of Astoria, who has the distinction of being the only lady member of the senate this year was a special guest.

Liechty, Homer Davis, Ed. Hatterberg, Veri Gower, Henry Raikie and Ernest Roth. On Tuesday evening the Christian Endeavor of the Chemeketa street Evangelical church held their monthly business meeting at the home of Miss Ruth Burch. Plans were discussed for the work of the year and the new committee were appointed. The names of Ruth Burch, Clara Crow, and Forrest Hiddy were added to the Roll Call. After the business of the evening was completed the meeting was adjourned and a social hour followed. Music and games furnished much enjoyment and merriment for all present. At a late hour delicious refreshments were served by the hostess, after which the members adjourned until the February session.

MY MARRIAGE PROBLEMS

CHAPTER 367

THE ALMOST PANICKY FEAR THAT FOLLOWED MADGE

Immediately after I was comfortably settled in my seat in the train I realized I had not seen the last of the reporters. Almost directly opposite me sat Miss Cargill and Mr. Rickett, chatting in comradely fashion, while two seats behind them, young Mr. Smythe ostensibly was buried in a magazine. None of them made any attempt to speak to me on the journey. Miss Cargill nodded brightly and smiled when I caught sight of her, and Mr. Rickett lifted his hat with smiling courtesy. But Mr. Smythe, to my great relief, apparently ignored my existence, although I was sure that from his vantage place behind me he was furtively watching me. With a sudden racing of my pulses I realized that I was actually under their espionage. Neither Miss Cargill nor Mr. Rickett would misquote me or write anything which had no foundation in fact, because of the high ideals of their craft which I held. But I saw now, what I had failed to see before, that they would in all probability follow me to Caldwell to make sure that I did not change my mind concerning Dicky's escapade when I reached there, and give them some valid excuse for a further story.

That they were more dangerous to my fear of publicity than young Smythe, I saw plainly. I was sure that I had so thoroughly cowed him that he would be most careful what he wrote concerning me, although, of course, he would misquote me as far as he dared. But Miss Cargill and Mr. Rickett had much greater courage than he, and they were also sure of the exact boundary between a safe newspaper story and one that might prove a boomerang. Under Close Observation.

I did not need to look again at their keen, shrewd faces to know that they would not leave my vicinity until they were convinced that my meeting with Dicky and Claire Foster would not provide them with material which they could use. The discovery startled me, and in a way was a most salutary thing for me. If I had not made it, I should have brooded all through my journey over Dicky's actions, and the warnings my father and Lillian had given me. Instead, all my faculties were bent toward the one question, how to avoid any chance of further publicity. I already had made up my mind to greet Dicky and Claire Foster as if nothing had happened. But I had made one exception. Dicky invariably kisses me upon my arrival from or departure on a journey. I had felt that I could not bear to receive that kiss. But I saw now that if I could not unobtrusively avoid it, I must submit to it.

When the train stopped I gathered up my bag and purse and followed the crowd to the staircase leading to the upper level. At the top stood a number of people waiting for our arrival. As I reached the top of the stairway I saw a tall, apparently old man with white mustache and sandy beard turn quickly and bury himself in the crowd. (To be continued)

Mr. Rickett's voice sounded distinctly in my ears. "I'll put yours on the wire, too," he said. Madge is Puzzled. "Thanks so much," Miss Cargill's voice replied. "Here," I heard the click of her purse. "No time now," crisply. "We can settled when I get back." "All right," and as Mr. Rickett walked briskly down the aisle I glimpsed the charming comradely relations which exist in the newspaper world between the men and women workers. A world in which each pays his or her score with scrupulous exactness, but in which the men have not lost their chivalrous instincts toward women.

Young Mr. Smythe hurried after Mr. Rickett, and a furtive glance out of the window showed me the two men going into the telegraph office of the station. Each handed the operator some sheets of paper and a bill. Each ignored the change and raced back to the train just as it got under motion. I puzzled over this until the train drew into the Pennsylvania station. I knew they had had ample time to send telegrams before they boarded the train. Why had they wired from Southampton? It must have been something concerning my presence on the train. When the train stopped I gathered up my bag and purse and followed the crowd to the staircase leading to the upper level. At the top stood a number of people waiting for our arrival. As I reached the top of the stairway I saw a tall, apparently old man with white mustache and sandy beard turn quickly and bury himself in the crowd. (To be continued)

Mr. Rickett's voice sounded distinctly in my ears. "I'll put yours on the wire, too," he said. Madge is Puzzled. "Thanks so much," Miss Cargill's voice replied. "Here," I heard the click of her purse. "No time now," crisply. "We can settled when I get back." "All right," and as Mr. Rickett walked briskly down the aisle I glimpsed the charming comradely relations which exist in the newspaper world between the men and women workers. A world in which each pays his or her score with scrupulous exactness, but in which the men have not lost their chivalrous instincts toward women.

Young Mr. Smythe hurried after Mr. Rickett, and a furtive glance out of the window showed me the two men going into the telegraph office of the station. Each handed the operator some sheets of paper and a bill. Each ignored the change and raced back to the train just as it got under motion. I puzzled over this until the train drew into the Pennsylvania station. I knew they had had ample time to send telegrams before they boarded the train. Why had they wired from Southampton? It must have been something concerning my presence on the train. When the train stopped I gathered up my bag and purse and followed the crowd to the staircase leading to the upper level. At the top stood a number of people waiting for our arrival. As I reached the top of the stairway I saw a tall, apparently old man with white mustache and sandy beard turn quickly and bury himself in the crowd. (To be continued)
