that state officials should see fit to have the great seal set in the floor of the state capitol rotunda at Salem protected by a railing.

The sentiment earlier mentioned was so much against the real purpose of the Daughters of the American Revolution that the above apology, in the form of a correct statement, will considerably rectify matters. In the report of the closing session of the Oregon conference, the Astoria Budget makes particular mention of the wise guidance of the state regent, Mrs. Seymour Jones, at all sessions.

In honor of her birthday on Sunday, Miss Maybelle Propp has invited guests to an eight-cover dinner at the Colonial Dame Tea Shoppe. In the evening the party will attend the Oregon theater to see the popular play "Sally."

The Kensington club will meet tomorrow afternoon with Mrs. F. S. Anunsen, 1110 N. Capitol St.

Harry Corf, head of the department of English literature at Reed college, who will be in town for the March social meeting of the Salem Woman's club will address the women on a topic that is bound to prove both stimulating and interesting.

The committee for the tea hour includes Mrs. George G. Brown, Mrs. H. H. Olinier, Mrs. John Caughill, Mrs. F. W. Durbin, Mrs. Leigh McIntire, Miss Margaret Cosper, Mrs. D. X. Beecher, Mrs. S. M. Endicott, Mrs. Paul Hauser, Mrs. John Evans, Mrs. John Scott and Mrs. S. P. Kimball.

CHAPTER 416.

THE REASON DICKY TOLD MADGE HE WAS WORRIED

"I don't like the looks of that fellow," Dicky, with his hands thrust in his pockets, stared after the ingratiating chauffeur as he rapidly made his way downstairs. "Did you see him give us all the once-over?" he went on. "Looked as if he suspected something was wrong. What's your phony about our looks, do you think?"

Claire Foster's face crimsoned quickly and her lips parted as if to speak. I knew she meant to reveal the indiscreet comment she had just made to the effect that we were not anxious to have our names on the letter-box downstairs in the hall, and I hastened to forestall her. Dicky had not heard it, and it would do no good for him to learn it now.

"Nothing at all," I returned blithely. "He was simply so much pleased at his tip that he gave us all the 'once-over,' as you say, so that he would be sure to spot us another time. Dicky's special weakness is tipping taxi drivers." I went on glibly, turning to Claire. "If one of the gentry has ever seen him before, he makes his taxi turn summersaults whenever he spies my husband."

Claire laughed nervously, but Dicky still looked serious.

"Haven't I Heard—"

"That's all right for nonsense," he said, "but the fact remains, I don't like that fellow's looks or his actions."

"Do you think he's seen us before?" I asked with a vivid recollection of Harry Underwood's warning.

"No-o," he said slowly, "but he's got us jotted down in his mental card index now, all right. Something or other, I'd like to know what, gave him an idea that we didn't exactly court observation, and he has that little fact filed away. If he ever hears anybody inquiring for us—"

He broke off abruptly and busied himself with getting the bags out of the narrow hallway.

I shook my head at Claire Foster in a warning that she should not betray her responsibility for the chauffeur's suspicion, and she turned abruptly, walked to the window and stood looking out of it so that her flushed face was hidden from us.

Dicky came into the living room and strode up and down its brief length with every line of him spelling perturbation. I wondered if he, too, were thinking of the words Harry Underwood had uttered. For fear his attention might be attracted to Claire, I said the first thing which came into my head.

"Haven't I heard you say that a taxi driver's litany was 'See nothing, hear nothing, speak nothing?'"

Claire surprised Dicky.

"It should be," he replied, "and the old flight-hawk horse cab drivers lived up to it. Many of the taxi men do also, but some of them are either actual or potential blackmailers, and it's said a 'wise' few are affiliated with the criminal gangs which infest the city. Well, I'm glad he hasn't anything real on us. Let's forget him. I'm about starved. What about some dinner? Shall we go out to a restaurant, or shall I dance down the stairs and have a meal sent in?"

Claire Foster turned from the window, her face alight with enthusiasm.

"Oh, let's have one sent in!" she cried. "I think that will be the coyote's howl. If there's anything more appetite-inspiring than a waiter coming in with trays and steaming dishes I don't know what it is, do you?"

She threw me the question perfunctorily, and chattered on as if I told myself a bit resentfully—she were the only one to be considered.

"Be sure you remember my favorite dishes," she admonished Dicky with a lifted forefinger. "I warn you, I am very particular as to the broiling of a chicken, and too much pepper in my soup makes me cross for days."

Her tone was the type I have heard used by pampered, tyrannical women to their men folks who have spoiled them. It is one which Dicky has never heard from me or any of his feminine relatives, and I cast a sly glance at him to see how he liked it.

To all outward appearances he was pleasantly amused at her audacity. He was grinning widely at her, his eyes registering the flattering attention which girls like Claire demand from men. But I, who knew every line of his face, had caught the slightly uplifted eyebrows at her first speech which betrayed that he was as surprised as I at the girl's rudeness.
