girls the pupils are divided into two sections, the clever half studying sciences and the dead languages, while the duller girls give their time to cookery and housewifery. I also understand the second set refer to the first as the 'brainy old maids,' so perhaps they are not so dull after all. A girl should be proud she can cook and sew, fron and wash and that she can save some money wisely and well. I hold that a girl who cannot do all these things is not well educated, although she may have been awarded the degrees of all the universities in the world,"
