CARGO IS VARIED

Shipments From Port of Portland Given; Lumber Is Moving

The steamer North King of the Alaska salmon fleet cleared from Portland May 6 with a cargo of 3300 tons. Looking over the manifest of this cargo one would almost believe oneself to be in a department store, for there was taken aboard many supplies for the canneries and the men. Coal and fuel oil for heat, canned goods fresh vegetables and many other types of groceries, live chickens, cows, sheep and hogs, cases of fresh fruit, tobacco and cigarettes, as well as clothing, machinery, furniture and repair parts for the canneries were among the commodities.

This vessel will stay in Alaskan waters until fall when it will return with a full load of canned salmon which will be shipped from Portland to the various ports throughout the world.

The record of domestic lumber shipments for the month of April was the largest ever shipped from Portland. This figure was 42,426,798 feet, of which 23,247,499 feet was to be delivered at inter-coastal ports, and 17,171,299 feet at coastwise ports. Intercoastal shipments were made to ten different cities on the east coast of the United States and the Gulf ports. The points to which the largest shipments were made were New York with 13,058,190 feet; Philadelphia, with 2,506,000 feet; Providence, R. I., with 2,420,476 feet; Boston, with 1,962,000 feet. Other shipments to the east coast were made to Poughkeepsie, Baltimore, Newark and Newport News and on the gulf coast to Houston and New Orleans.

There are also ten experimental tracts in Linn county, and about the same number in several other valley counties, being raised under the auspices of the Oregon Agricultural college, from seed obtained at the state flax plant. All these things are spreading the interest in the industry. But there has not been any question concerning the growing of the flax; though there is plenty of work to be done towards developing the best strains here.

In his campaign for economy President Coolidge could get splendid ammunition from the writings of Benjamin Franklin, who scared his readers into frugality by computing with compound interest the cost of an unnecessary purchase.

The world's most powerful

Lighthouse is no longer on the seacoast but near Dijon at the center of France, on the line of air traffic from Paris to the Mediterranean. Its billion candle-power revolving light, turned on for the first time a fortnight ago, has a visibility of 500 miles, and sweeps over Lille, Brussels, Frankfurt, Milan, Arles, Angoulême, Alençon and Rouen. Over in this case, means above, but the higher an aviator goes the farther away he can see the flash from Dijon. The lighthouse, which will be dedicated on May 15, stands on a plateau 2000 feet high, at the crossroads of traffic to Geneva, Milan and southern France.

a crop that could be sold in a local market. In that way they could secure much better results. The flax industry is to be one way that the farmers can be assured of a crop that can be sold locally. Diversified farming can be made the salvation of the farmer and the means by which prosperity can be brought to all. It is expected to see the time, when a ton a day of flax fiber is turned from the Oregon state flax industry. The Willamette valley can grow the flax and Salem can manufacture the linen, was his contention.
