CHAPTER 460

The Reckless Ruse Tried and the Race She Ran

As I saw the grey limousine approaching—the same car, I was sure—which had trailed my taxi on Fifth avenue, a feeling of panic almost made me lose control of the wheel. It lasted for only the fraction of a second, however, and then I forced my brain to planning my course.

That they were looking for me it was foolish to question, after Lillian's warning.

With the thought that there was one chance in a thousand of their not recognizing me if I bent over the wheel and dashed past them, I crouched low, and pressed my foot on the accelerator. But before the car had covered much more than its own length the vision of my little lad stopped me. They must not me permitted to come near him.

If they obtained a good look at me, I reasoned, they would, no doubt, turn the car and start in pursuit of me, and even if I eluded them, which, with a sinking heart, I doubted, they would realize that my trail led away from the farm house instead of toward it.

The car was almost upon me, proceeding at a leisurely pace, and I guessed that someone within it was watching the road. Being careful not to stall my engine, I brought my own car to a stop, held out my hand in the usual motorist's signal for aid.

"What Do You Want?"

The gray limousine slowed, swung in so close to me that the fenders of the two cars almost touched. I had left myself plenty of space at the right, however, and I had my car ready for a touch to send it onward. But I needed all the resolution I had to keep myself sanely poised when I saw in the car the fashionably yashmack-wearing woman, who, I was sure, was Grace Draper.

She neither moved nor spoke as
