Renorseless After Slaying Eight, Including Three of Her Children

"They bothered me—so I killed them." That is all the remorseless Mrs. Emmanuel Sorenson, 28, of Donneborg, Neb., has to say about eight murders she admits. Her eight victims, all of them poisoned, were her first husband, her first husband's mother, three of her own children, and three children of relatives. The murders were committed over a period of three years.

Russian exiles seem to have fared best in Yugoslavia, which took 13,000 of them, including 5,000 of the soldiers of General Wrangle, who is living at Karlovitz. At the Belgrade opera 60 per cent of the force are Russians, including the prima donna, Mme. Popova, and a number of Russian professors have been added to the university faculties. At least half of the people who sell newspapers or run small bookstalls are Russians. Although debarred as aliens from official posts, many of the exiles are employed by the government.
