Flax on Hill Land—George Ballard, whose farm is near the Fringle school brought to the Statesman office last evening a sample of flax from his field of three acres. It is already 36 inches in length and is not through growing, though it is not far from the blossoming stage. The remarkable part of it is that this flax field is on high land. If there is any flax in the Salem district this year that is under 30 inches high (high enough to make it worth the top price, $38 a ton), the writer has not heard of it. The abundant rains have evidently spoiled all the small flax—made large flax of it, capable of giving the long line fiber that sells at high prices, being worth now around 33 cents a pound.
