THE MERCY OF GOD:—Who is a God like unto Thee, that pardoneth iniquity....because He delighteth in mercy....Micah 7: 18.

BEET BY-PRODUCTS VERY VALUABLE

At the annual convention of the United States Sugar Manufacturers association in Chicago last month, attended by representatives of the beet sugar interests from all parts of the country, who make up its membership, Stephen H. Love, president of the association, emphasizing the importance of the sugar beet crop aside from its direct monetary returns, declared that "the residue of the crop in the form of crowns and tops, pulp and molasses would produce more human food per acre in the form of meat than an acre of corn."

Mr. Love is one of the big men in the beet sugar industry, and he would not make such a statement without being able to prove it—

And the very valuable by-products of sugar beets will make that industry especially desirable for such a section as the Salem district.

Think of our lands turning off annual products that will yield $1000 to $3000 an acre, or even more, in such a stable cash market as that for sugar—

And with by-products besides with a higher value than corn in feeding live stock! Especially are the by-products valuable in the dairy industry, which is the step-mother of the poultry and swine industries.

And the by-products are, under modern processes, carried through the whole year. The tops may be preserved in silos, but they are now generally being dehydrated, under a process discovered in Germany lately. The factory being built at Bellingham, Wash., is to have a dehydrator for the beet tops—the men who furnish the beets having the preference for the dried tops.

The next most important industry for the Salem district, after the linen industry, is without doubt the beet sugar industry, and our people ought to broadcast our advantages in this respect, and secure a factory at the earliest possible time. It can be done. It could be accomplished as a cooperative enterprise.

There is another possible by-product of sugar factories that is being taken up seriously by the trade in Australia, and that is the making of power alcohol to be used in automobiles in the place of gasoline. The price of gasoline is very high in that country, and engineers believe that power alcohol may be made from the molasses by-product of sugar manufacturing and sold at a lower price. The undertaking is already well under way, corn and other products being proposed to eke out the supply of the molasses by-product, which will necessarily be limited by the quantity of sugar manufactured in the country.

We are probably not at the alcohol power stage in Oregon yet; but it is likely that we will arrive at that stage before very long.

The writer has contended, and believes, that we can find the labor here in the Salem district for the thinning and harvesting of the beets, because we are used to securing many laborers annually for our strawberry and tree and bush fruit and hop harvesting. How important this matter is, is illustrated by the fact that many beet sugar districts in the United States are obliged to employ laborers brought from long distances. In California, Mexicans are largely used. The beet growers of Caro, Mich., have just imported 400 Mexican laborers for the thinning of their beets.

FOR AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION

At the last session of congress a bill carrying an increase in the amount of money furnished by the government for agricultural experiment stations was passed. The result of its provisions should be to continue the upbuilding of the system of experiment stations which have been doing excellent work even under financial handicap.

This is the Purnell act and provides an additional $20,000 for the Oregon Agricultural experiment station and a like amount for every other state as an initial appropriation beginning July 1, this year. This sum will be augmented by another $10,000 in 1926 and a like amount each year until the total of $60,000 shall be appropriated for each succeeding year in addition to the sum now allowed.

"The funds appropriated pursuant to this act shall be applied only to paying the necessary costs of conducting investigations or making experiments bearing directly on the production, manufacture, preparation, use, distribution and marketing of agricultural products and including such scientific researches as have for their purpose the establishment and maintainance of a permanent and efficient agricultural industry and such economic and sociological investigations as have for their purpose the development and improvement of the rural home and rural life, and for printing and disseminating the results of such experiments and researches."

In thus providing for more extensive effort to solve the difficulties of agriculture, congress has taken a wise step. It has recognized in this way to a greater extent than heretofore the necessity of developing agriculture as our most important national asset.

The initial use of these funds will be watched critically. The states are individually spending tremendous sums of money for education and, of course, will indirectly contribute these appropriations. With many products now equal to or greater than the demands the first step should be to improve distribution and to build up an effective market system.

CHAPTER 478

HOW THE NIGHT PASSED AND WHAT THE DAY BROUGHT TO MADGE

Katherine and I clung tightly together for a few voiceless seconds, as might two child playmates who had found each other after being lost. Then I put my lips to her ear:

"Is your charge asleep?" I asked.

"Yes," she returned as cautiously.

"Then get your purse and your wraps," I whispered. "We'll have to leave everything else. And we must try to get out now or it will be too late."

She looked at me with an inscrutable expression.

"How do you expect to get out?" she asked.

"By taking off the lock of either your outside door or mine, with these." I held out the small but sturdy tools Lillian had given me so long ago.

She shook her head with a pitying smile.

"Don't you know, child, that those outer doors are locked on the hall side with heavy chain bolts? I saw them when I went down to the kitchen. I ring this bell," she indicated a push button, and then whispered, "when I wish to go to the kitchen for my charge, and a guard comes up, unlocks the door, takes me down and brings me back again."

I looked at her vacantly for a second or two. Then I covered my face with my hands.

"Is it so bad then, Madge?" Katherine asked in a low, tense voice.

"It's as bad as it can be," I whispered hopelessly. "I've just overheard a conversation which destroyed my last hope. The man who brought you here, the seemingly old man was Harry Underwood, and until ten minutes ago I thought him working against these people. But instead, he is one of their most powerful figures, and as soon as he decoys my father here they are ready for their big play. Grace Draper knows who you are, and you know what that means. No, Katherine, all there is left for us now is to meet bravely whatever may come."

"She's Invited to a Reunion."

I heard her murmur one word, "Jack," and I saw that her face was white and set, but that her eyes were glowing.

"Don't you dare give up hope until the breath is out of your body," she whispered tensely then achieved a smile, how could I not guess. "Is that Hibernian enough for you?" she queried whimsically. "I'll back your father and Lillian Underwood and Allen Drake against a dozen Grace Drapers and Harry Underwoods."

"Lady! Lofely lady!"

The hoarse voice of Joe sounded wearisomely in the room back of Katherine.

"Yes. I'll be there right away," she called, then caught me in a warm embrace.

"Keep up your courage," she whispered. "And I'd put back that lock. No use of making them unnecessarily angry."

I kissed her with the feeling that I might never see her in the flesh again, and when she had gone I obeyed her injunction as to the lock. Then I went back to the couch and began the torturing vigil whose horrors I shall remember while life is in me.

Katherine's optimism, whether real or assumed, I could not share. I believed I was spending my last night on earth, and the agony of longing for my little son, the knowledge that it was my own egregious folly which had brought me to this pass, almost maddened me.

I had left behind no trace of myself. It might be hours or days before Katie gave up the address of Mrs. Durkee which I had confided to her. And there would be
