Silverton

SILVERTON, Ore., June 22.—(Special to The Statesman).—A silver tea was held at the First Congregational church Friday evening the program being given by the pupils of the vacation school. The school has been conducted for two weeks, two and one-half hours of instruction being given each day, and the program was demonstration of what had been learned. Much surprise was expressed by those attending that so much could be accomplished by the pupils in so brief a time. A part of the program was the reading of scripture passages from memory. A short drama was the concluding number. Although only sixteen pupils were enrolled the success was such that it is hoped by those in charge that a similar school may be carried on next summer on a larger scale. Rev. Clayton Judy, pastor of the church, conducted the school.

Mr. and Mrs. Boehm and son have arrived at Madison, Wis. Mr. Boehm made the trip in ten days, over the Yellowstone Trail.

NEWS NOTES FROM MOVIELAND

The extras' gate at the old Essanay studio in Chicago—what memories it must recall. Through it Gloria Swanson, Rod LaRoque, Agnes Ayres and scores of other popular screen personalities entered on their film careers.

The other day, while resting on the set at the Paramount studio, Virginia Valli recalled the days when she, too, sat on the extras' bench and wished and wished that she might have a chance to act with Francis X. Bushman and other "sheiks" of that time. Virginia is playing the lead in Tom Meighan's latest, "The Man Who Found Himself." She appeared opposite Tom in "Back Home and Broke," you may recall.

Virginia used to pass the picture studio on her way to and from school, she says, and finally she dared to walk in and sit on the bench reserved for the extras. Her progress has been slow but sure since then, and the frequency with which her name appears as leading woman in productions best attests her success. "The Price of Pleasure" is one of her late pictures. "Up the Ladder," "The Lady Who Lied," "Peacock Feathers," and "Siege" are other recent ones.

Star Dust
Dolores Costello, daughter of Maurice Costello, one-time popular screen hero, has the lead in the Fox film, "Greater Than a Crown" opposite Edmund Lowe. * * * We almost lost one of our newest bridegrooms the other day. Bert Lytell, playing in Curwood's "Steels of the Royal Mounted," nearly lost his life in "shooting the rapids." * * * Richard Carle, veteran musical comedy star, has a part in DeMille's "The Coming of Amos," starring Rod LaRoque. Ruby Lafayette, the "grand old lady" of the screen, also appears. Jettie Goudal is the feminine lead. * * * Charles Ray's next for Chadwick will be another "rural" and Duane Thompson will probably be his leading lady. * * * Ralph Ince will direct Evelyn Brent in her next, "Miss Robinhood." Bold—but not bad—lady robbers seem to be popular just now. * * * Larry Semon is doing a turn at the megaphone and directing his wife, Dorothy Ewan in a feature at F. B. O. studios. * * * D. W. Griffith has finished his latest production for United Artists, "Sally of the Sawdust," and is casting his first for Paramount, for whom he now becomes managing director. Carol Dempster goes with Griffith to Famous-Players and will play the lead in "That Royle Girl." * * * Constance Talmadge's dressing room at the United Studios resembles a jewelry shop while she is filming "Her Sister from Paris." Connie wears two diamond anklets and no less than 16 bracelets in almost every scene.

MY HUSBAND'S LOVE is the explanation satisfactory? "Perfectly Sherlockian," he glibbed, and then I was at Leila's side, nothing relievedly that in spite of her injury, her eyes were less tortured, her face more composed than it had been the night before.

"Madge! You dear!" Her face lighted up with genuine pleasure as I bent to kiss her. "How wonderful to find you here!" Has Alfred told you what a stumble-heels I was?"

"He told me your ankle was hurt," I returned, "and the taxi is waiting outside. Alf, suppose you tell him to come to this door?" I indicated a door a few feet from where we were sitting.

"Great head," Alfred commented appreciatively, and promptly departed. I waited only till the door had closed after him before turning to Leila.

"They will be surprised and grieved to see you in this state," I said, using the plural pronoun designedly.

"They?" she repeated. "Oh! Is Dicky at the house?"

"No, but Bess Dean is there for dinner," I replied, hoping that my voice was casual, and carefully looking away from her. I did not wish her to suspect that my information was meant as a warning.

I heard a little gasping breath, but after a second or two, Leila's voice sounded composedly:

"I wish she'd chosen some other night. I do hate to be ill or disabled when strangers are in the house. Not that Bess is a stranger—she's awfully good company, but—she isn't like you."

I turned to her in time to receive the wistful, tender smile with which she finished, and I paid a little mental tribute to the will-power which had enabled her to conquer the emotion I knew she had felt at the mention of Bess Dean's name.

There was distinct cleverness, too, in the fact that she had not professed pleasure at the news of Bess' Dean's presence as a less adroit woman would have done. That later on she would confide her fears and doubts to me, I was sure, but the imminence of Alfred's return forbade any giving way to the emotion with which such a confidence could not help but be invested. Indeed, she scarcely had finished speaking before he came breezily into the station again.

"He'll be at the door by the time we are," he said. "Ready, sweetheart?" His tender smile at Leila was something for any wife to cherish.

"Don't you think I could walk?" she asked.

"That's not the question," he flashed back, stooping toward her. "You're not going to try. Put your arms around my neck, there—that's right. Madge, have you her purse? All set, everybody!"

He bore her light weight with ease through the door of the waiting-room to the taxi.

"Suppose you get in first. Madge," he said, "and you can ease her down to the seat."

I obeyed him, and Leila was seated without a twinge of pain. Five minutes later we had rolled to the side door of the Durkee home.
