MY HUSBAND'S LOVE

CHAPTER F55

WHY MRS. DURKEE KNOCKED ON MADGE'S DOOR LATE AT NIGHT

"I think that would be the best thing you possibly could do."

My response to Lelia's query as to the advisibility of joining the conference between Alfred and his mother was prompt and decisive. And when, her slight figure vibrant with renewed strength, her face glowing with loving sympathy for her husband and his stricken mother, she went swiftly down the stairs. I thanked my particular little joss for the success of the task I had set myself, that of freeing Lelia from the obsessing terror of Bess Dean's machinations.

Even if, after further reflection, Lelia should discount the assurance I had given her of Alfred's essential fidelity to her, yet her mother-in-law's need would keep her from dwelling upon her own affairs until I should have had time to deal further with Bess Dean.

Just what course I should pursue in blocking the malicious, vanity-prompted game of my former colleague, I did not as yet know. First, I must find out the secret which I guessed she shared with Dicky and Alfred, a secret which I was sure had something to do with Alfred's car. But my first step in ascertaining the truth lay in Dicky's direction, and I could not see him until he returned from his trip.

"It's All Due to You."

For the next two days there was nothing I could do, and with the sense of relaxation one feels when effort is no longer required, I undressed and crawled into bed, realizing that I was utterly spent with fatigue. I had not thought that I would be needed again; but I had not fallen asleep when little Mrs. Durkee's soft voice sounded outside my door.

"Madge, are you asleep?" she murmured and I knew that if I did not answer her she would go away, unwilling to disturb me. For an unworthy second I hesitated, for I was more tired than I had known, then I answered cheerily:

"No indeed: come right in."

I snapped on the reading lamp by my bed, and by its light I saw that her face was tear-stained, but peaceful.

"I couldn't go to sleep without thanking you for what you have done for us all," she said bending over and kissing me warmly. "Lelia is like a different woman—all that dreadful sadness and nervousness gone—and both she and Alfred are so dear about my illness. They had comforted me so much. I don't care what comes now. I sha'n't be a baby any longer. And it's all due to you."

"Nonesense," I parried. "I suppose I'm responsible for the lovable qualities which have made your son and daughter-in-law towers of strength to you."

Madge Comforts Mrs. Durkee.

"No—o," she admitted, "but," with a characteristically comical little grimace, "you thought out all those qualities by making them think their own affairs amounted to nothing beside mine. At least that's the way they are acting."

In her voice was the innocent, gratified vanity of a woman, who, after years of subordinating herself to the plans of others, suddenly finds herself the center of interest. The smile which accompanied her words was infectious, though pathetic, and I smiled back at her, though I found my eyes perilously near to tears.

"And that's the way they ought to act," I said didactically. "Everything's going to revolve around you now for a while, so just sit back and take things easily."

"I'm going to," she promised. "But, child, you mustn't cut your visit home short for me. Alf told me how generous you were to promise to come back immediately, but I'm not going to let you."

I raised myself to a sitting posture, drew her to me and kissed her.

"And I'm going to do exactly as I please about it," I answered, "so don't waste any more time worrying about me. I'll take the first train east in the morning and be prepared to come back at any minute. I told Alfred to telephone me after he had seen Dr. Foxham."

"I know," she answered, "and—and—I'm an awful bluffer. I do want you to come back if I have to go to a hospital. Someway, I feel so safe when you're around."

My throat constricted with a sudden clutching fear. But I forced myself to a cheery answer.

"I won't let anything get you." I promised with a little laugh, but after she had left the room—indeed, at intervals through the night and my railway journey home the next morning—I wondered fearfully if I could make my promise good.
