MIND. My intuition was right. When I finally had convinced the long distance operator that our telephone heard Alfred Durkee's voice, insistent, impatient: "But, I tell you, that is the number, and there always is somebody at home there! I-"

"Hello! Alfred?" I put in quickly, and he changed his sentence in the middle. "Thank goodness, Madge, it's would get you." His voice was tremulous with nervous excitement, and I caught a despondent note in it which chilled me. "What-what news?" I faltered.

"Pretty bad, Madge," he returned, slowly, and I caught my breath.

"You mean Dr. Foxham thinks really is-" He struck in as if he could not

But this morning, the last thing she said to me was that no matter what Foxham said, she wanted to wait to see what that old pill down here in Marvin had to say about it. Nobody knows when he will be at home, and when he does come he's just as likely to tell her that she has neuralgia, or rheumatism, or something like that." Would your mother accept the verdict of Dr. Braithwaite, Dicky's brother-in-law?" I asked quietly. "What!" Alfred shouted the word into the telephone. "Do you mean that he-" "I mean that with your permission, I'm going to ask him to come on here and operate on your motuer, or have her go there. And he'll know whether there's any mistake in Dr. Foxham's diagnosis, although I'm afraid there isn't."

"I'll Answer For Her." "But, Madge," Alfred protested, though I caught a sudden hope in his voice. "Dr. Braithwaite is one of the biggest men in the country. Could he leave his hospital? Would he?"

"He's pleasing himself more
