REPAIR WORK HALTED AT WASHINGTON SCHOOL

SCHOOL BOARD REVERSES ITS RECENT ACTION

Building Will Not Be Used First Semester; Several Contracts Approved

The Washington junior high school building will not be reopened for at least the first semester of the next school year.

This was the decision of the Salem school board last night which adopted the recommendation of Superintendent of Schools George W. Hug and ordered repairs at the Washington school halted. The action of the board, which completely reverses the position taken at its previous meeting, followed a report from Superintendent Hug showing that all of the pupils expected to enter school this fall could be accommodated without the use of the old junior high school building.

No action was taken directly to rescind the motion passed at the previous meeting and the new decision was made effective by the order of the board directing the building committee to halt repairs on the old structure.

Dr. H. H. Olinger was reelected to the chairmanship of the board in the annual reorganization, L. J. Simeral was chosen to act as vice chairman for the year.

Roy Neer and Simeral were then named to compose the insurance committee with other committees formed as follows: Finance, P. M. Gregory and Simeral; supplies, William Gahsdorf and Neer; buildings, Simeral and Gregory.

The following teachers were elected: Georgia Crofoot at a salary of $110 a month; Barbara Hickson, $110; W. L. Van Loan, $150, and Orrel Powell, $130.

Routine business and the hearing of reports from principals and heads of departments occupied the remainder of the attention of the board.

Genaro Logical Successor to Flyweight Crown; Villa's Death Adds to Dearth of Real Ring Kings

By NORMAN E. BROWN

The tragic death of Pancho Villa, little Philippine battler and flyweight champion of the world, leaves the championship affairs of fistiana more muddled than ever.

When Johnny Dundee surrendered the featherweight championship without a struggle and Benny Leonard, from his mother's shoulder, announced his retirement from the lightweight throne, the game was left with two kingless kingdoms—and without any kingly material in either one.

The heavyweight division has been a semi-comatose condition ever since the movies and matrimony started bidding for Jack Dempsey's time.

The bantamweight championship crown has been turned into a toy balloon that is bounced about the heads of the little fellows every few days.

Truly, a sad state of affairs.

Pancho Villa, until his sudden death, was trying to carry out of the role of champion as fadman likes to see it played.

First of all Villa won his title in the proper way. He met Jimmy Wilde, idol of Great Britain and flyweight champion of the world without a question, and knocked that little game Welshman out in seven rounds of real championship-caliber fighting.

That was in 1923. Last year, instead of resting on his laurels, he engaged in 11 battles—between

Frankie Genaro

January and August. Then he returned to his native land to draw the honors due a home boy who had won fame. He married, too. Then he returned to the game.

A few weeks ago, while suffering from the infected teeth which eventually caused his death, he went into the ring against the advice of physicians. He went in because he believed a champion should. Blows taken on his head in that bout did not help the infection, of course.

Now he is gone.

But one logical heir to his throne Villa held now looms. He is Frankie Genaro, holder of the American flyweight championship.

After a few bouts in this country, in which he showed his greatness as a fighter, Villa was given a chance at the American flyweight title held by Johnny Bluff and defeated the little war vet. That was in 1922. Two years ago, before he got a crack at Wilde, Villa met Genaro for the defense of the American title and lost to Frankie, who still holds it.

A match between Genaro and Villa has been in the making for many months. They were destined to meet last year, but an accident to Villa, I believe it was, prevented the meeting. Villa was willing to give his rival a chance at the crown.

Villa must be ranked as one of the hardest hitting little fellows the game has ever known. His specialty was a double punch delivered with his left. He hooked it to the stomach or heart and then with the speed of a riveting hammer, sent it to the jaw. That was the blow which felled Wilde.
