

MY HUSBAND'S LOVE

Adelle Garrison's New Phase of REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

CHAPTER F93

IS THERE SOMETHING JIM WISHES TO TELL MADGE ALONE?

It was my flashlight whose rays found Jim first, and though the light from Katie's played upon his bound figure but a few seconds later I had time to slip my hand over her mouth and silence the terrified scream which tore from her throat at the sight of her husband.

"Keep quiet," I muttered sternly. "He isn't hurt, I'm sure, but you don't know who may be near us."

"I be so goot," she whispered humbly, as you should let me go by my man."

"Of course, silly," I whispered back. "Put out the flashlight, keep close to me and don't utter a sound."

"I not breathe, me," she promised earnestly, and in the darkness we groped our way toward Jim.

"I tumbled first with the gas, and found that it had been so carelessly tied that it's removal was an easy thing."

"Don't try to speak, Jim, for a little," I warned in a whisper. "Let the stiffness wear away from your mouth first. Katie, spread your coat over Jim's hands and hold your flashlight under it, so that I can see what I'm doing."

She obeyed me scrupulously, and I set to work on the securely knotted bonds. It was a tedious task, and Katie's sense of deference was not proof against the feminine instinct to say, "I told you so."

Jim is oddly excited.

"Maybe you wish now you had dot beeg knife you make me put down—no?—yes?" she whispered slyly.

Jim saved me the admission I would have felt bound to make. From his stiffened lips came the one word explosively:

"Pocket!"

I grasped his meaning at once, but it was several seconds afterward that I realized he had almost shouted the word, taking no precaution against being overheard.

"Look in his pockets, Katie," I said quickly. "I think he has a knife there."

"I know eet," she answered, handing me the flashlight and rumaging through the pockets of her spouse. "I beeg fool no think of dot before. Here eet be!"

She held up the hand triumphantly, and the next moment, with the aid of her strong teeth, had opened the blade. But she did not hand the knife to me.

"You better hold coat und flashlight, let me out," she said unhesitatingly but authoritatively. "I more used to knife like dees."

"You are right, Katie," I assented readily. Within a few seconds she skillfully had cut the bonds confining Jim's wrists and ankles, and with both of us helping him, he got up to his feet, staggered a bit and then spoke, slowly as it was his wont, but with no marked effects of the treatment to which he had been subjected.

"I'm all right," he assured us, and I knew by his voice that he was speaking the truth.

But there was a suppressed excitement in his tone, foreign indeed to stolid Jim, and something awkward, indefinable in his manner as he moved forward with Katie's arm underneath his—she persisted in the delusion that he could not walk without her aid—gave me a sudden queer little intuition that his excitement concerned me in some manner, and that he was only waiting Katie's temporary absence to tell me about it.

"What's That?"

Katie had no intention of being absent for some time, to come, however. Her anxiety for Jim's safety allayed, she was ready to indulge her cinema-fied soul with all the thrills to be gleaned from the situation.

"Jeem! Jeem!" she pleaded in a stage whisper. "Did dot boot-legger get away?"

"He sure did," Jim replied in ordinary tones, "clean as a whistle."

"Hush-h!" Katie warned dramatically. "Maybe somebody hear."

"The whole world can hear now," Jim returned a bit despondently. "The fellow's gone, and the man—"

"He stopped short, went back laboriously.

"The fellow's gone a long way by now, and there's nobody else around to hear, so there is no use whispering."

"The trooper didn't pass your way then?" I asked.

Jim was unaccountably long in answering, I thought.

"Ye-es," he said at last, "but what's that?"

of earth removed in the construction of the new subway, sewers, water mains and other projects. The city has had this plan under consideration for a number of years, but it has been postponed from time to time because of lack of funds.

The total cost of salvaging the low ground and making it habitable is estimated at 30,000,000 yen. The subway construction is expected to provide sufficient earth to cover 333 acres. The aid of the government will be asked in the reclamation work.
