Travel Dropping Off—

The number of cars stopping at the Salem auto park has diminished during the week, according to word received Thursday. The park will have a temporary rush of business during fair week, as several of the cabins have been rented and paid for already for the week. Explanation for the decrease in the number of machines stopping at the park was given that travel is dropping off, and people are going home for the winter. The park, however, will be open at least all of next month, and perhaps longer.

About 500 people from Salem attended the Billy Sunday meeting at Portland last night. More than half the crowd went by automobile. The rest had a very good trip on the Oregon Electric, filling a special train of seven cars. The Oregon Electric trip was made in an hour and a half each way, there being no stops beyond Chemawa. The Oregon Electric gave splendid service.

The Salem crowd got a lot of attention at the big tabernacle, from Billy Sunday and his workers. The Salemites will agree unanimously that they heard one of the greatest sermons preached and acted that they ever expect to hear and see. Still, Billy Sunday was not at his best physically, for he was suffering from a severe cold.

The Salem crowd sang some songs. At the end of the service, Billy Sunday shook hands with all the Salemites.

The first 10 per cent for the second Salem linen mill is being paid. A lot of payments were handed and mailed in yesterday.

The following appeared in the first edition of the Oregonian of this morning: "We intend making a drive for $100,000 in Portland and when we have $500,000 signed up we will start building the linen mill at Salem," said Thomas B. Kay, state treasurer, a Portland visitor yesterday. "Five subscriptions have been made in Portland and these were large and have been paid up. We need about $100,000 more, however, and I am

Story of Hold-up Is Told Police in Order to Obtain Necessary Funds

When a feller's broke and wants to see a show, what's he goin' to do?

One way was adopted last night by two young boys, one about 12 and the other 14, who appeared at the police station where the elder delivered a sad story of being robbed by a masked man with dark clothes and a revolver in everything.

"How much did he get, buddy?" queried Officer Olson.

"Fifty cents that we were going to the show on," the lad replied. After considerable stalling, during which the demand was made for action upon the part of the police, the pair disappeared.

Later Officer Olson saw them going down the street. The oldest of the two said the man at the show let them in. Doubting their story, Officer Olson asked the cashier at the Bligh about the boys. She told him that the two started to walk in without buying a ticket and when she called attention to the omission, the oldest replied that he had bought one ticket and had just stepped out of the show for a few minutes. She let them pass.

Officer Olson grabbed the police car and picked the boys up farther down the street. The younger one finally admitted that they had not been robbed but the elder boy stuck to his story for some time.

satisfied that the money can be raised in Portland if a proper selling campaign is launched. There is no place in the country which is better suited for the cultivation of flax than the Willamette valley, and when the linen mill is established the people will realize that we have a real industry here in this line." Mr. Kay came to Portland for the special purpose of meeting Representative Dempsey of New York, who is interested in the linen business. They have met on several occasions in the east.

It was learned that the Portland boy was a former inmate of the reform school and when notified, Superintendent Gilbert told the officers that he had not been reporting for eight months and to hold him until morning. The younger was not held.
